Who Should Guard the Attorney-Client Privilege When Documents Are Seized by Law Enforcement?
The State Bar of Georgia’s suicide awareness campaign has a dual purpose, directed toward lawyers and judges who are suffering from anxiety and depression and may be at risk for suicide, as well as all Bar members, who need to recognize the severity of the problem and be able to identify warning signs among our colleagues.

Welcome to the February edition of the Georgia Bar Journal. In this issue, State Bar of Georgia President Sarah B. “Sally” Akins kicks things off with her article “Making a Strong CLE Program Stronger.” Akins writes that one of her goals for the remainder of the 2022-23 Bar year is to find and implement ways to enhance the Bar’s already outstanding CLE program. This involves looking for innovative content, considering new means of content delivery and being mindful of affordability. The State Bar and ICLE have also been reviewing and analyzing the results from a recent CLE satisfaction survey.

Joy White, member of the State Bar of Georgia Attorney Wellness Committee, also addresses professional growth and personal challenges in her article, “The Case for More Self-Love in the Legal Profession.” White writes, “unfortunately, many attorneys struggle to realize that they can’t love their work or anyone else until they love themselves.” She stresses the importance of self-love, which is accepting and loving yourself for who you are while ensuring your actions and behaviors follow suit.

Our legal article this edition is Don Samuel and Scott Grubman’s “Who Should Guard the Attorney-Client Privilege When Documents Are Seized by Law Enforcement?” Samuel and Grubman write about filter teams and how these professionals can help protect attorney-client privilege. There are, however, many legal questions surrounding filter teams due to the current, relevant laws being in flux.

If you’re interested in Georgia’s legal history, be sure to check out our feature articles. In “Standing on Broad Shoulders: The Lives and Legacies of Georgia’s First Black Lawyers,” Hon. John Browning writes about leading figures such as Aaron Bradley, Rev. James Simms and Edwin Belcher. You’ll learn about Styles Hutchins (admitted 1878) and Judson Lyons (admitted 1884), the first two African American men to practice law in Georgia. For more on Georgia’s legal history, you can read Wilber Caldwell’s article “The Dodge County Courthouse at Eastman: The Grand Old Courthouses of Georgia.”

Another piece I’d like to highlight is Nkoyo-Ene Effiong’s “Better Clients Are a Compelling Brand Away.” Effiong, director of the Law Practice Management Program, writes about your professional brand as the personality of your law practice. It’s a distinct identity for your business in the mind of consumers. Effiong explains the importance of creating a strong, authentic brand and walks readers through the process of professional branding. Whether you need advice on branding, technology, firm finances or organization, the Law Practice Management Program has the services and training. Read Sheila Baldwin’s article, “The Law Practice Management Program,” to learn more about this valuable Bar resource.

Thank you to our Georgia Bar Journal readers, and we’ll see you in April.
One of my goals for the remainder of this Bar year is to seek ways through which we can enhance our already outstanding continuing legal education (CLE) program and implement those improvements.

Under the leadership of Director Dee Dee Worley and with support from the Commission on Continuing Lawyer Competency (CCLC), our CLE Department manages and regulates the mandatory CLE program and related rules enforced by the Supreme Court of Georgia. Our charge is to produce and promote a high-quality, comprehensive and innovative CLE program that is relevant to the professional needs of Georgia lawyers and conveniently available to them at affordable costs.

To continue meeting this objective, we are constantly looking for ways to include innovative and up-to-date CLE programming, including ethics and professionalism courses. This includes a consideration of nontraditional and interactive presentation methods to make CLE sessions more appealing, as well as greater use of legal educators, judges and diverse subject matter experts as CLE speakers.

Toward this goal, the State Bar recently distributed a member survey on CLE satisfaction. We received a tremendous response to the survey and are presently compiling and analyzing the results.

Member value is always a top priority when it comes to CLE programming and delivery. That is why we are engaged in a fresh review of how we offer CLE programs, which includes consideration of expanding our recorded sessions for rebroadcast, alternative scheduling that meets the needs of busy Bar members, greater accessibility for all members regardless of geographical location or firm size and, of course, pricing considerations that could include more discount offers.

The term CLE refers to the annual fulfillment of continuing legal education hours required of State Bar members. You will also often hear about ICLE, which is the Institute of Continuing Legal Education, the Bar’s provider of CLE programming. Previously a separate organization based in Athens, ICLE was brought in-house as a program of the State Bar of Georgia five years ago.

Integrating ICLE into the State Bar not only created an additional revenue source, allowing us to continue providing quality CLE programming at an affordable price to Georgia lawyers, but we were also able to consolidate services and have ICLE staff and services in the location where most in-person CLE seminars take place, namely the third-floor conference center at the Bar’s downtown Atlanta headquarters.

All ICLE activities are designed to promote a well-organized, properly planned and adequately supported program of continuing legal education to provide Bar members a means of enhancing their skills and keeping abreast of developments in the law, as well as engaging in the study and research of the law in order to fulfill our responsibilities to the legal profession, the courts and the public.

Starting in March 2020, the COVID-19 pandemic forced the legal profession and justice system—along with the rest of society—into new ways of delivering services. Teleconference technology introduced a new way of holding court proceedings that had previously been conducted exclusively in-person. The same was true for CLE programs where physical attendance was required.

Originally a reaction to a global health emergency, the concept of offering CLE programming via livestream demonstrated other benefits for Bar members. In October 2021, CCLC permanently changed the regulation related to distance learning. Lawyers can now complete all or any portion of their CLE requirement through approved distance learning CLE programs.

Attorneys can, of course, attend in-person CLE courses but are no longer required to attend an in-person CLE course to complete their CLE requirement. The CCLC made this change to allow lawyers more flexibility, to lower costs for lawyers by reducing travel-related expenses for attorneys who live in remote locations or far from learning centers, and to allow lawyers more opportunity to participate in courses that directly interest them.

In this issue of the Georgia Bar Journal, we asked our State Bar of Georgia officers, “What behavior or personality trait do you most attribute your success to, and why?”

In addition to livestream programming, ICLE maintains a library of webcasts with new content uploaded periodically for members to fulfill CLE requirements virtually through on-demand webcasts. You can find a listing of available webcasts on the Bar’s website.

Having access to effective and affordable CLE programming is already one of the most popular benefits for State Bar members. In his October 2022 article for the Georgia Bar Journal, Executive Director Damon Elmore shared some of the responses he had received from Bar members when they were asked about their most-used benefits.

Albert Reichert Jr. of Macon said, “The CLE programs, such as the Fiduciary Law Institute, are my most-used State Bar benefit. They are first class, and they have the added benefit of getting to know one’s fellow lawyers better. They promote collegiality and learning. One never stops learning how to practice law.”

Madalyn Davis of Atlanta concurred that ICLE programs were her most-used Bar resource. “Trying to find ways to satisfy all the requirements for CLE (would be) exhausting if the State Bar did not provide excellent programs and information,” Davis said. “The ICLE programs provided by the Bar are superior in content, access and location than other places that offer CLE. I have never regretted attendance at a State Bar CLE and have always walked away with better connections—professionally and personally—and pages of notes of new knowledge.”

The State Bar of Georgia is committed to the professional development of our members by providing quality legal education courses through ICLE and a dedicated group of staff to help maintain your CLE status reports and standings through CCLC. If you have questions about your CLE transcript, deadlines, regulations or rules, you may contact the CLE Department at 404-527-8710 or cle@gabar.org. If you have questions for ICLE, send them to icle@gabar.org or call 678-529-6688.

If you completed and submitted the recent CLE member survey, thank you. If not, I’d love to have your feedback on enhancing CLE programming. We need to hear from Bar members in communities around the state as to what additions or other changes you would like to see so that our continuing legal education program can efficiently and effectively meet the needs of all of our fellow Georgia lawyers. From the YLD President

Dear reader, I hope you will excuse this article deviating from what I typically write. As the 76th YLD president, I am proud to be serving during our 75th (aka diamond) anniversary.

Working for the Profession and the Public

Our organization’s history begins on May 31, 1947, when the Younger Lawyers Section of the State Bar of Georgia was created at the Annual Meeting. Since then, the YLD has lived up to its motto of working for the profession and the public. The YLD was instrumental in the founding of Georgia Legal Services Program in 1971, and our members have continued to support pro bono and legal aid efforts with both our time and money. We have completed countless community service projects—from painting playground equipment, to sorting food at food banks, to packing personal hygiene kits for unhoused people and more.

The YLD is also the source of the Georgia High School Mock Trial Program. Founded in 1987, it has grown into a nationally recognized educational program. Georgia hosted the National High School Mock Trial Competition most recently in Athens in May 2019, marking the third time that the national competition was held in our state.

Another project credited to the YLD is the rewrite of Georgia’s Juvenile Justice Code. In 2004, the YLD secured funding to create a model juvenile code, and the YLD’s Juvenile Law Committee spearheaded an entire overhaul of the previous code. The governor’s Criminal Justice Reform Council focused on reforms to Georgia’s juvenile law and legislation was passed unanimously by the Georgia General Assembly during the 2013 legislative session to rewrite and recognize Georgia’s juvenile law.

YLD Signature fundraiser

The YLD has organized a Signature Fundraiser benefiting charitable organizations since 2007. The YLD and its supporters have raised more than $800,000 for those organizations while also having a good time and building better friendships among our members.

Georgia Legal Food Frenzy

One in eight children in Georgia are at risk for hunger, and food banks are working around the clock to meet an overall 30% increase in need. Working with Georgia’s Attorney General and Feeding Georgia (formerly known as the Georgia Food Bank Association), the Legal Food Frenzy competition has raised the equivalent of 20 million meals since 2012. The Legal Food Frenzy helps keep Georgia’s seven regional food banks stocked so they can feed more families. The 12th annual

Brittanie D. Browning | YLD President-Elect

A few different traits contributed to my success—one of which is organization. I love my planner and a good to-do list to check off tasks. Organization and those lists are helpful in my role as an officer for the YLD and in my practice to keep everything in order.

Conscientiousness. I always try my best to be conscientious about all sides of a situation and all possible arguments one can make. I believe that most of the successes I have had can be attributed to that trait because it minimizes the risk of overlooking important details.

Creativity and persistence. Finding loopholes and new ways to either apply existing law or to create new law is key in my appellate practice. As for persistence, just ask my opposing counsel. When I believe in something, I do not back down.

I enjoy getting to know people and I am proud of my loyalty. I also think being fiercely competitive and enjoying my work contributes to my professional success.
live streaming our meetings in a concerted effort to reach our members where they practice.

This year, we also launched “The Good Lawyers Podcast” where we try to answer the question: “What makes a good lawyer?” After serving as the host for season one, I have handed the microphone to the very capable Sarah Young. The first episode of season two is now available on Apple Podcasts, Google Podcasts and Spotify. I encourage you to subscribe today.

CLE Programs
The YLD and its more than 25 committees have been putting together top-notch CLE programs ranging from cutting edge topics like e-sports or changes to criminal trial practice methods due to the influence of podcasts, to more traditional programs featuring a variety of justices, judges, lawyers and even everyday people. We continue to innovate in response to our changing world and profession. We have begun to incorporate additional focus on mental and physical well-being to better support our members with the creation of the YLD Wellness Committee.

YLD Leadership Academy
Founded in 2006, the Young Lawyers Division Leadership Academy of the State Bar of Georgia is a program for young lawyers who are interested in developing their leadership skills as well as learning more about their profession, their communities and their state.

The Leadership Academy counts more than 500 alumni. Those alumni members include solo practitioners, judicial law clerks, partners in large and small law firms, assistant district attorneys, public defenders, nonprofit lawyers, ADR specialists and in-house counsel for Fortune 500 companies. The benefits of having a friend and legal resource in practically every corner of the state and in any practice area cannot be overestimated.

Our Leadership Academy continues to build better leaders and future leaders for the profession and our state.

Disaster Legal Assistance
This isn’t totally a highlight reel. There have been hard times along the way. We have experienced a pandemic, natural disasters, personal tragedies and more. We continue to support ABA efforts to provide legal assistance to victims within federally declared disaster areas by running a hotline where volunteer lawyers provide counseling, assistance and/or referrals to aid callers in their recovery. The Disaster Legal Services Hotline is a partnership between the ABA’s Young Lawyers Division

Awards and Accolades
As you might expect, the YLD has won a litany of awards and accolades over the last 75 years. The most recent is being acknowledged from the floor of the Georgia Senate on Feb. 8 with SR 100 “recognizing and commending the Young Lawyers Division of the State Bar of Georgia for its 75 years of service.”

Endnotes
1. I must give credit to past president John Sammon for inspiring me to write this article celebrating our 75 years.
2. The Younger Lawyers Section was renamed Young Lawyers Division in 1998.
3. I cannot take credit for this. Our organization is thriving today because of the leadership of all our past presidents. I am especially thankful for the leadership of Will Davis, Bert Hummel and Elissa Haynes during the pandemic.
Advancing Your Legal Career

I am frequently asked for advice on how to advance one’s career in the legal profession. With so many talented and hardworking attorneys competing for a limited number of positions, it can be difficult to stand out and succeed. I usually remind those asking that I may not be the best source for guidance, although I have been fortunate in the opportunities afforded me and the roles—legal, quasi-legal, and business—that I have personally held. What I do know is that some things never change. Career development in the legal profession requires a combination of hard work, dedication, and a willingness to continually learn and adapt.

Still, this discussion has come up several times over the past few months. It happened once with an attorney who is originally from Folkston, Georgia. It happened again over lunch with a leader in the attorney placement field. Finally, it happened again as part of the Corporate Counsel Institute in December. It was the presentation and discussion at that seminar that led to additional analysis and discussion with those directly involved with this process at varying points and their unique perspectives.

To get started, I solicited help from my old friend (like, back to my YLD days old), legal recruiter, networker extraordinaire, legal matchmaker and South Asian Bar Association of Georgia (SABA-GA) president-elect, Waqar Khawaja and his friends over at SABA-GA. Their practices vary across the metro-Atlanta area.

I asked them a few questions and some of the answers are outlined here for those of you who may be wondering the same thing. Professional development is important to many of our members, and the continued growth of attorneys is essential to improving the quality of legal services.

How can lawyers stay up to date on developments in their field, and what are some ways to continually learn and grow as a professional?

Gautam Reddy, a partner in the area of construction law with Kilpatrick Townsend and Stockton, LLP, suggested a number of resources including the Georgia updates in this publication, as well as legal websites like Law360. But he went further to suggest, “In addition to online resources, joining a Bar section or professional organization related to your practice area is a great way to organically stay up to date. These organizations often host CLE events and panel discussions or publish newsletters that often touch on recent developments.”

His final suggestion was to be “consistently self-critical in a healthy manner.”

Nithya Amaraneni, counsel at Cousins Properties, offered this: “I find it extremely helpful to subscribe to and read articles from the myriad of publications available...”
out there whether it’s Law.com, JD Supra or articles from law firm practice groups. Some of these are paid subscriptions but if your firm or company is willing to pay, definitely jump on the chance. Another way to learn and grow is through CLEs.”

What are some ways that lawyers can gain leadership skills, build a book of business or client roster and advance in their careers?
Suhail Seth, a partner at Polsinelli focused on mergers and acquisitions and corporate law, offered a few thoughts. He first reminded me that leadership skills and building a book of business are two separate things and should be discussed as such. But, on the business development side, he suggests:

It’s cliché, but business development comes down to networking. As with all skills, networking takes time to perfect. Some may be natural at it (but not perfect) and others may not be as well equipped. It takes getting out of your comfort zone, putting yourself out here and a lot of patience. At the end of the day, ‘networking’ will lead to client development by virtue of relationship building—which takes time. Sure, some might hit a home run on their first at bat, but more often than not, networking is akin to planting a seed and waiting for it to bear fruit. You will have to ‘nurture’ your plant, but if you put in the work and effort, you will eventually see it pay off. Finally, one characteristic/trait that I think is conducive to being an effective leader and networker: authenticity. Be authentic.

What strategies can lawyers use to advance their careers within their current firms or organizations?
Seth additionally advised, “Firms and companies advance people who both will represent them positively and will add value to the organization. Value will mean different things at different places, but for most organizations, this will mean business growth and profitability. Ask how you can contribute to either/both in addition to doing your work (and doing it well) and act accordingly.”

What are some resources and organizations that can provide support and guidance for lawyers seeking to develop their careers?
Zain Haq, an associate with Kilpatrick focused on technology, privacy and cybersecurity, shared this: “Bar organizations are a great place to start. I’ve found that lawyers are, for the most part, willing to go out of their way to help others. Joining a bar organization allows you to meet lawyers with common backgrounds and/or interests and to develop a network of lawyers that can help you get to where you want to go. It can be very fulfilling to be in a room with like-minded people all striving toward a common goal.” I wholeheartedly agree.

How can lawyers balance their professional and personal lives, and what are some strategies for maintaining that proverbial work-life balance?
I do not know if we could have a career development discussion without the work/life balance question. So, when I posed this question to Parth Matalia, an associate at Jones Day working in the area of intellectual property, he offered this: “Everyone operates differently, so different techniques work for different attorneys. I think what worked well for me was to seek out good attorneys to work for who I knew would respect my time. One of my top priorities as a job-hunting law student was to find out (as much as it was possible) what kind of people I would be working for and whether their work style would fit with mine. For me, at least,
I am willing to go the extra mile for attorneys like that when it does come time to buckle down.”

How can lawyers who want to switch practice areas or move to a new firm best position themselves to do so?

Amaraneni suggested, “No matter where your path takes you, one of the most important things is to work hard and learn as much as possible. While employment law and real estate might seem like complete opposite practice groups, if you have a good foundation in being a lawyer with base skills, the transition is smoother. The same goes for moving from a law firm to in-house. I made the transition about a year ago and have loved every minute. I found the transition to be seamless given my knowledge of my practice area and the skills I picked up by working very hard as an associate in a large law firm.”

What strategies can lawyers use to advance their careers within their current firms or organizations?

Rahul Garabadu, a senior voting rights attorney with the ACLU, suggested, "Keep an open mind about the types of work you’re given, especially as a new at-

In Georgia and most other jurisdictions, state and federal, a typical criminal case often involves seizures of computers and other devices that may contain millions of communications. How is the attorney-client privilege protected? Today, in one way or another these problems are addressed either by a filter team (sometimes referred to as a “taint team” or a “privilege team”), a special master or a magistrate judge. But the law is in flux how these “teams” or arbiters should be comprised and how they should function. This article addresses the rapidly developing law that governs the formation and implementation of filter teams.

The developing law reflects several factors, including the different locations from which the digital information is acquired. A search warrant executed at a law firm inevitably captures an enormous amount of privileged information involving scores of clients, many of whom have no relationship at all with the suspected criminal activity for which there was probable cause to seize the documents.1

A search warrant targeting one lawyer (whether seeking information about the lawyer or a client),2 results in the seizure of less privileged information. A search that targets a business may be able to limit the privileged information that the agents are permitted to examine by sequestering the communications involving a specified number of lawyers who provide legal advice to the business.3 Yet, even accounting for these differences in the target and venue of the search, courts have examined the blueprint for filter teams and reached divergent views about what is necessary to protect the privilege holders without unduly hampering the efficiency of the law enforcement mission.

Though courts have been approving filter teams for the past 30 years at a common law pace, the evolution of the law went into overdrive with the 4th Circuit decision in In re Search Warrant Issued June 13, 2019 (Baltimore Law Firm).4 From a criminal defense lawyer’s perspective, Baltimore Law Firm exemplifies the principle, “bad facts make great law.”

In Baltimore Law Firm, Lawyer “A” represented Client “A” (who was also a criminal defense lawyer); Client “A” represented a drug dealer. Law enforcement suspected that Lawyer “A” was corrupt and so was Client “A.” A search warrant was issued for Lawyer A’s law firm to seize evidence of Lawyer A’s corrupt rep-
The Fourth Circuit lit the fuse, and now courts throughout the country are deciding how to monitor (or even permit) the filter team process that has become routine in white collar criminal prosecutions.
law firm’s clients who had nothing to do with the crimes being investigated. But Baltimore Law Firm has had a substantial impact on the functioning of filter teams even in the jurisdictions that reject the Baltimore Law Firm’s apparent total abolition of filter teams.

Georgia Law
In Georgia, when a search warrant targets an attorney’s office (but the attorney is not alleged to have been involved in wrongdoing), to ensure that the attorney-client and work product privileges are protected, Georgia law provides that special procedures must be used. This code section focuses on cases in which the attorney is not under investigation, yet there is probable cause to believe the attorney possesses documentary evidence relating to another person’s crime. The warrant application must state that absent the execution of a search warrant, there is probable cause to believe the documentary evidence that is sought will be destroyed or concealed.

Only a superior court judge is authorized to issue a search warrant directed at an attorney. When a law office is the location to be searched, the state must use a special master to conduct the search and conduct the initial privilege review. The statute also includes a specific exclusionary rule if the statute is violated.

Should the filter team protocol be subject to court approval in advance of the search/seizure (for example, in the search warrant that is issued by the magistrate)?
Even before the ubiquitous filter team protocols became contentious, courts had divergent opinions about whether search warrants should include detailed explanations about the protocol for searching a computer—even when the seizure of privileged communications was not anticipated. Some courts required the use of search terms or date limitations. Ways to minimize the “plain view” discovery of evidence that was not identified in the “to be seized” clause of the warrant were formulated. Standard language appeared in most computer search warrants dealing with the method of making a mirror image of the data and expediting the process to minimize the amount of time the IT experts stayed at the premises.

Now, when searches are executed at businesses, or for other devices which are likely to include attorney-client communications, standard—almost boilerplate—language is included in the warrant about the use of a filter team.

After the seizure, should the privilege holder be part of the formulation of the filter team protocol?
Rarely are the privilege holders invited to participate in formulating the filter team protocol unless the privilege holders challenge the search or the protocol that the government has proposed and the court orders the parties to meet and confer.

Yet, the 4th Circuit in the Baltimore Law Firm case decried the ex parte proceedings that allowed the government to seek approval of the filter team process without any input from the law firm.

In United States v. Ritchey, the magistrate judge held that there is no immutable requirement that a search warrant outline the filter team process that will be implemented. However, the court applauded the government’s “typical” process of seeking court preapproval of its filter team protocol in an adversarial context or an informal, good faith resolution with the defendant ... Absent specific facts evidencing mishandling or other misconduct, courts have widely approved of filter team protocols formed through this process.

Who should be conducting the filtering process?
This is usually a hotly contested issue. Of course, there should be no participation by any member of the filter team in the work of the prosecution team. Though most courts do not start with the belief that a special master is required, historically special masters have been used in unusual situations. If a filter team is deemed to have been too lax in protecting the privilege, a court may call an audible and direct that a special master take over. If the court finds a filter team has failed to protect the privilege, the court may also utilize the exclusionary rule to deter future lapses and protect the privilege to the extent the genie can be put back in the bottle.

Nevertheless, the prevailing view is that the government is not categorically prohibited from utilizing a filter team; most courts have rejected the Baltimore Law Firm holding that the separation of powers doctrine requires the court, not the executive branch, to be the initial arbiter of privilege applicability.

The controversy more often has a narrower aperture and only addresses whether the privilege “wall” is more likely to function properly if the filter participants (agents and assistant U.S. attorneys) are from another jurisdiction. This is advisable not just to avoid colleagues in the same office being required to keep secrets from one another, but it also avoids having prosecutors in the “home” jurisdiction reading local attorneys’ communications.

In particularly large cases with hundreds of thousands of emails to be reviewed, the Department of Justice will often use lawyers in their “special matters” unit that have the ability and know-how to sift through hundreds of thousands of emails and communicate with scores of privilege holders preparing privilege logs that may be hundreds of pages long.
What process should be used by the filter team?

In Korf, the 11th Circuit approved the filter team protocol that provided the privilege-holder the opportunity to review all seized evidence and to prepare a privilege log before the filter team reviewed the evidence. If the privilege-holders and the government agreed on the release of any other documents to the investigative team, the disclosure was permitted. If the privilege-holder and the government could not agree on an item on the privilege log, then a court order would be necessary to release any document. Thus, nothing could be produced to the investigative team, absent either the privilege-holder’s consent or the court’s approval (with notice to the privilege-holder). No document could be provided to the investigative team inadvertently by the filter team or without the knowledge of the privilege-holder.

What should happen after the filter team finishes its initial review?

Most decisions in the past 10 years have required the disclosure of seized material to the privilege holder prior to disclosure of any information to the prosecution team. This is commonly referred to as the “objection process.” Some courts require the filter team to provide all information to the privilege holder prior to disclosing anything to the prosecution team. Other decisions permit the filter team to disclose unprivileged material to the prosecution team but requires disclosure of questionable documents (or documents possibly subject to the crime fraud exception) to the privilege-holder in an effort to reach agreement (and if no agreement is reached, the documents in dispute are provided to the court).

One exception to the rule that requires participation of the privilege holder in the disclosure process exists in cases of wiretaps. When a target’s phone is wiretapped, a communication with an attorney may be intercepted; sometimes these calls are quickly minimized; other times, not. In either case, the question is whether the intercepted privileged communication can be provided to the prosecution team if the filter team determines that the communication was not privileged or was subject to the crime fraud exception. In United States v. Scarfo, the 3rd Circuit approved the filter team’s disclosure of the seized communications to the prosecution team without notifying the privilege holder that the interception had occurred, or that the filter team decided that the crime fraud exception applied.

What happens if the filter team discovers another crime in the documents being reviewed that are either privileged or not privileged?

If the incriminating evidence is privileged, it cannot be produced to the prosecution team. But is the filter team obligated to return the evidence to the privilege holder and keep the existence of a newly discovered crime a secret not only from the prosecutors in this case, but from all other investigators?

What if the privileged document establishes guilt of the privilege-holder of a violent crime in the past for which some other person has been wrongfully convicted? It is one thing to ask the perennial question about a defense lawyer’s ethical obligation to keep this information within the privilege. But does the filter team have the same obligation?

For example, assume the filter team reviews a memo (in an insider trading case), in which a suspect reports to the lawyer, “I bribed the mayor and three county commissioners in order to win the contract to repair the county’s sewers.” Is the filter team barred from doing anything with that document that was lawfully obtained (by authority of a search warrant) and lawfully examined (by authority of the filter team process)? Are the filter team members allowed to make “derivative use” of the information? Can the agents on the filter team subpoena bank records of the county commissioners or the suspect? Can the agents on the filter team ask the defendant if he is willing to have a voluntary conversation about some matters that have come to the attention of the agents? Or are the filter team members limited to the review of “insider trading” documents?

Are these questions all answered by considering the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, and, if so, how large is the orchard and how close to the tree must the fruit fall to be suppressed? Or is this scenario akin to the plain view doctrine? Just because the document may be subject to the exclusionary rule, is the filter team sworn to secrecy in all venues from disclosing criminal conduct it discovers during a legitimate search that is authorized by a federal magistrate? Plain view is customarily relied upon to legitimate the discovery of unexpected evidence during a computer search. But plain view assumes the law enforcement officer is in a place the officer is entitled to be. But nobody is supposed to be in a position where an observation of privileged documents should be possible—and certainly not a law enforcement officer.

More problematic is the choice confronting the privilege holder if it is learned that seized documents reveal another crime with documents that are not privileged but have not been unearthed by the filter team. This possibility presents a strategic problem for the defense. Should the privilege holder “whistle by the graveyard” and hope the incriminating nature of the document is not discovered by the prosecution team? Unless the privilege holder is allowed to challenge the breadth of the search (seizing documents that were not within the scope of the warrant), there is no basis to challenge... the filter team’s authority to present the non-privileged documents to the investigating team. Yet, unless the incriminating evidence is a needle in a haystack that the investigating team may not find, the lure to challenge the production of the incriminating document to the prosecutors may be too much to ignore.

What happens to documents that are unquestionably not within the “to be seized” clause of the warrant, but are not privileged? Are those documents provided to the prosecution team? Should the filter team be responsible for also filtering documents that should never have been seized?

Courts have wrestled with the interplay between the plain view doctrine and computer searches for decades. There is no practical way for searching agents to avoid “viewing” various documents or images on a computer that are not within the “to be seized” clause of a search warrant.31 Ironically, a filter team may be the solution in many cases if the filter team is charged not only with filtering privileged information, but also filtering documents—and returning the documents to the owner—that are not within the “to be seized” clause of a warrant.

In a recent district court opinion, the court approved a protocol that required the government to begin the review process—even before the filter team gains access to the documents—by limiting the seizure to documents that had relevant search terms.

First, a FBI forensic analyst not associated with either the investigative team or the filter team would run certain search terms against the content of the phone to identify responsive materials without reviewing any of the underlying materials themselves. ... Any materials not captured by the search terms would be deemed non-responsive and would be returned to [the privilege holder] without either the filter team or the investigative team ever reviewing them.32

In short, the court created a pre-filter team filter.

What is the procedure for challenging the process pursuant to Fed.R.Crim.P. 41 or in a civil action?

The recent Trump and Mar-A Lago litigation33 has highlighted some courts’ reluctance to involve the judicial branch in the executive branch’s investigation of criminal matters. District courts have no general equitable authority to supervise federal criminal investigations. Prior to indictment, the executive branch—Department of Justice—is in charge unless exceptional circumstances are shown to necessitate the court’s intervention.34

Richey v. Smith identified four factors that would authorize the court’s intervention during the investigatory phase of a criminal case, in particular, to require the government to return seized property: (1) whether the government has displayed a callous disregard for the constitutional rights of the plaintiff; (2) whether the plaintiff has an individual interest in and need for the material; (3) whether the plaintiff would be irreparably injured by denial of the return of the property; and (4) whether the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law.35 The Trump decision in the 11th Circuit held that there was no jurisdiction for the federal court to intervene in the investigation—based on the appellate Court’s conclusion that Trump did not satisfy even one of the Richey factors.36

The 11th Circuit explained why a civil case seeking equitable relief is the appropriate procedural mechanism for challenging the filter team protocol in Korf. Because seeking equitable relief does not challenge the validity of the search or seizure under the Fourth Amendment, the proceeding is not linked to any criminal prosecution.37 The 11th Circuit concluded, “The damage from any error in the district court [regarding the filter team process] would be ‘definitive and complete,’ if interlocutory review is not available, and would outweigh any ‘disruption caused by the immediate appeal.’ ... The whole point of privilege is privacy... So the Intervenors’ interests in preventing the government’s wrongful review of their privileged materials lie in safeguarding their privacy. ... Once the government improperly reviews privileged materials, the damage to the Intervenors’ interests is ‘definitive and complete.’”38

Trump, on the other hand failed to articulate any misconduct on the part of the government and offered no specifics about an irreparable injury that would result from the court’s failure to intervene in the criminal investigation. For that reason, his civil case was dismissed by the 11th Circuit.39

Conclusion

The evolution of the filter team process is ongoing. As the circuits come to grips with the protocols that authorize prosecutors to make the initial privilege determinations (a determination that in all other contexts is a judicial function), and the courts’ involvement in what has traditionally been the executive branch investigatory function (reviewing seized evidence), nothing should be taken for granted by either the defense or the prosecution.

Determining whether the crime-fraud exception applies involves a two-part test: (1) there must be a prima facie showing that the client was engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct when they sought the advice of counsel, that they were planning such conduct when they sought the advice of counsel or that they committed a crime or fraud subsequent to receiving the benefit of counsel’s advice; and (2) there must be a showing that the attorney’s assistance was obtained in furtherance of the criminal or fraudulent activity, or was closely related to it. 6. Prior to the appeal to the Fourth Circuit, this provision was modified, and the non-privileged documents were first furnished to the law firm prior to the documents being provided to the prosecution team.

7. The record revealed that 99.8% of the 52,000 emails seized by the government were not from Client A, were not sent to Client A and did not mention Client A’s surname.

8. The Court relied heavily on the earlier Sixth Circuit opinion in In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 454 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2006), which held that the privilege holder has the right to make the initial assessment whether documents subpoenaed by the grand jury are covered by the attorney-client privilege, not the government. There is obviously a difference between the use of a filter team when the documents are already in the possession of the government by virtue of a search warrant seizure and when the documents are still in the possession of the privilege holder (or an attorney) when the issue arises in the context of a grand jury subpoena.

Standing on Broad Shoulders: The Lives and Legacy of Georgia’s First Black Lawyers

The distinction of being Georgia’s first African American attorney belongs to Styles L. Hutchins—admitted to the Georgia Bar Association in 1878.

BY HON. JOHN G. BROWNING

The preeminent historian of Black lawyers in America, the late J. Clay Smith, once lamented that, in many states, their history is “uncertain.” Add the perspective that the account of their professional contribution is “overlooked” and “often inaccurate,” and the description would be more complete. Unfortunately, the history of Black persons who overcame the legal profession’s color barrier in Georgia could be fairly described as all of these, especially overlooked and sometimes wrong. For example, when the Augusta Chronicle memorialized the 1924 passing of Judson Lyons in a 2020 article, it described him as “Georgia’s First African American lawyer.” In reality, that distinction belongs to attorney Styles Hutchins, whose 1878 admission to the Georgia Bar pre-dated Lyons’ admission in 1884 by more than six years.

Even “official” histories of Georgia’s legal profession omit any mention of the state’s Black legal pioneers, or worse attempt to whitewash history by denying their very existence. For example, the State Bar’s own “From Banished to Justified: A History of the Legal Profession in Georgia” makes no mention of any Black lawyers in the decades following the Civil War.
War. It even goes so far as to state that before 1892, “Georgia’s legal profession during this period was made up entirely of white males.” Other histories of the Bar perpetuate this misconception. For much of Georgia’s early history, entry into the legal profession—as it was in most of the young republic—was not that daunting. By order of Georgia’s General Assembly in 1789, an oral examination by a Superior Court judge and a demonstration of “moral rectitude” was sufficient for a law license. During the Civil War, new restrictions emerged; in addition to state citizenship and “good moral character,” white male applicants were required to have “read law” (usually under the tutelage of an older lawyer or judge) for an unspecified period of time in order to be proficient enough to pass an oral examination that might draw upon pleading and evidence, equity, Anglo-American common law, the codes of the state and the Confederacy, and local rules of practice. And although Black men would eventually integrate into the ranks of Georgia lawyers, resistance to women (of any color) becoming attorneys persisted for decades. During an 1894 symposium on “Requirements for Admission to the Bar,” one speaker noted that Bar applicants, under the Code, had to be “of the male gender. Georgia is not yet ready to swap wifehood and motherhood even for female legal lore. The Georgia Code does not lend its influence to bring woman down from her present high estate.”

Indeed no woman would be admitted to practice in Georgia until 1916.

Aaron Alpeoria Bradley
The first attempts by trained Black lawyers to gain admission to practice in Georgia were unsuccessful. The first to try was noted activist and politician Aaron Alpeoria Bradley. Bradley, who was biracial, was born enslaved on a plantation owned by Francis Pickens in South Carolina in approximately 1815. He escaped to Boston in the 1830s, where he received the support of abolitionists as well as an education. In 1856, after studying the law, Bradley became only the third Black lawyer admitted to practice in Massachusetts, and the fifth in the United States. He moved to Savannah, Georgia, in 1865 and quickly became known for his vocal criticism of social injustices. Bradley was one of the first to call for reparations of both land and cash to Black Americans, and he spoke out against police brutality and perceived racism in the courts as well. Bradley went so far as to call for the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson and to encourage former slaves to seize the property of their former white owners, and the latter efforts resulted in Bradley being charged with, convicted of and imprisoned for sedition.

After serving a year at hard labor in the Fort Pulaski stockade, Bradley was -turned in his quest to gain admission to the Bar. He applied for admission to practice before Georgia’s U.S. District Court in 1867, but Judge John Ersking denied his application. Ersking based his decision on the belief that Bradley was inadequately grounded on the “first principles” of law, and also felt that he lacked “moral and mental qualifications.” But the real reason is likely found in Judge Ersking’s other comments about Bradley, citing the activist’s “impudence and egotism.” A defiant firebrand like Bradley who championed Black causes was the last person members of the establishment wanted to see with a law license. Bradley continued to seek admission to the Georgia Bar, and to publicly object to his repeated rejections. He was assailed in the press, which at one point made baseless allegations that Bradley had been disbarred in Boston for “malpractice.”

Unable to get a law license, Bradley turned his attention to politics. In 1868, he was elected to the state senate. After his public service (including an unsuccessful run for Congress) ended in 1870, Bradley went back to practicing law, albeit without a license. State authorities caught up with him in 1875. Bradley moved to Beaufort, South Carolina, in 1876, where he continued to practice law and promoted Black migration to Kansas. As late as 1881—not long before his death the following year—Aaron Bradley was still trying to get admitted to practice in Georgia courts, “but was refused” at every turn.
Oddly, Georgia had a Black judge before it had its first Black lawyer. During the Georgia Constitutional Convention of 1869, it was decided that judicial positions would be filled via appointment rather than through elections. With Black voters constituting a majority in multiple counties, this had the effect of almost certainly “eliminating the possibility that Blacks could be elected to the bench.” But in a surprising move, Gov. Rufus Bullock appointed Rev. James M. Simms to the judgeship of the First Senatorial District Court in 1871. While Simms was an educated Black minister who had been elected to consecutive terms in the Georgia General Assembly in 1868, he was not trained as a lawyer. The mainstream white press vilified him, and he was not much more popular with local Republicans; in less than a year, he resigned from office.

Rev. James M. Simms

Reconstruction Georgia had another trained lawyer in Edwin Belcher, yet he never practiced law. Born enslaved to a white father and a Black mother, the light-skinned Belcher was sent to Philadelphia in his infancy to be raised by a white guardian. Belcher “passed” for white, was educated in white schools and even enlisted in a white regiment in the Union Army. But after the war, with political opportunities opening up for newly enfranchised Blacks, Belcher began identifying as Black and received an appointment as assessor of internal revenue for the Third District of Georgia. With higher ambitions, Belcher attended Howard University’s new law school, which opened its doors in 1869, four years after the abolition of slavery and two years after a federal court empaneled a jury of black and white citizens. In 1872, he was among Howard Law’s first graduates, and was soon admitted to the Bar of the District of Columbia. Belcher returned to Georgia, but instead of practicing law, he was appointed postmaster of Macon by President Ulysses S. Grant.

Edwin Belcher

Georgia wouldn’t witness a Black lawyer being admitted to its Bar until 1878, with the admission of Styles Linton Hutchins. Hutchins was born in Styles Linton Hutchins. Hutchins was born in 1852, the son of William Dougherty Hutchins, who purchased his freedom that same year. Dougherty Hutchins, as he was known, would later become a successful barber, at one point forming a partnership with the former slave Alonzo Herndon, the founder of the Atlanta Life Insurance Company.

Young Styles apparently lied about his age to enlist with the 15th Infantry Regiment in 1864, at the age of 12. During his teen years after the war, Hutchins and his brother Alvin worked in their father’s busy Atlanta barbershop. The elder Hutchins encouraged education and saw to it that his son got a college education. Styles was one of Atlanta University’s first Black graduates and embarked upon a teaching career. Soon, he was serving as principal of the Knox Institute in Athens, supervising six other teachers and 250 students. But a legal career beckoned, and before long Styles Hutchins was studying at the University of South Carolina’s law school. After earning his law degree and gaining admission to the South Carolina bar, Hutchins began his legal career in the Palmetto State. At first, he enjoyed some success and was even appointed by Gov.
In a move that was “specifically designed to discourage black lawyers from moving from Northern states to Georgia,” in 1875, the Legislature passed a law that required lawyers who received their law degrees or admissions in other states to undergo an examination by the county’s presiding judge.

However, the 1876 elections ushered in racial violence and uncertainty across the South, and like many Black officials who left office voluntarily or involuntarily as Reconstruction ended and federal troops withdrew, Hutchins decided to leave. He returned to Georgia, determined to resume his legal career in a state that wasn’t exactly welcoming of Black lawyers. In a move that was “specifically designed to discourage black lawyers from moving from Northern states to Georgia,” in 1875, the Legislature passed a law that required lawyers who received their law degrees or admissions in other states to undergo an examination by the county’s presiding judge.21

Hutchins was undeterred, and for the next six months waged a vigorous campaign for admission. As he told the Atlanta Constitution,

I intend to practice law in this city. I have been in good practice in the courts of South Carolina from the supreme court down, and in the United States circuit court. I have my diploma. I think I am capacitated to practice ... If I have to stand an examination, I am ready for it.22

Most of the four-lawyer examination committee were skeptical at first of Hutchins. One of the examiners, believed to be Judge John T. Hopkins, was particularly harsh, no doubt due to Hutchins’ race. According to one newspaper, Hopkins “tried the old dodge, and put him through a course of questions such as nobody in the state could answer and reported against his admission.”23 Hutchins found an unlikely champion in James Banks, a young white lawyer on the committee whose eloquent recommendation to the court might have made the difference, and might have reflected changing sensibilities of a new generation:

It is a novel thing for a colored man to be admitted to practice law in Georgia. Many, however, have been admitted in other states, and I see from the papers that one was recently admitted in Alabama. I am proud to say such actions in southern states show a growing disposition to secure the colored man in the enjoyment of every legal right. Not in theory, but in fact. When this applicant was examined by me, I asked myself this question, which to some may seem an extreme view, but yet for me contains the true test. “Were Hutchins a white man, on this examination would I report in favor of his admission?” The character of his examination compelled an affirmative answer. It is, however, for your honor to decide, and I feel safe in saying that if he is entitled under his examination to be admitted, that your honor will not deny him the right on account of his color.24

Styles Hutchins was officially admitted to practice on Jan. 28, 1878. Not long after he became Georgia’s first Black lawyer, he also became the first Black lawyer to argue a case in the state. Not surprisingly, however, Hutchins encountered many of the challenges common to Black lawyers in the South during this time; disrespect from judges and white lawyers, and difficulty attracting and building a client base among the Black community. There were bright spots; the 1880 census placed the 28-year-old lawyer in McIntosh County, where he lived with his new wife, Clara. But the pressures, financial and otherwise, apparently took their toll on Hutchins, both personally and professionally. In 1891, Hutchins was convicted on criminal charges related to what one newspaper wag described as “the habit of mixing his clients’ money with his own,”25 and sentenced to two years in prison. By 1883, Hutchins was released, and soon thereafter he was divorced from Clara.

Seeking a fresh start, Hutchins moved to Chattanooga, Tennessee, where he opened a law practice and also became a partner in a venture with other Black businessmen to start that city’s first Black-owned and operated newspaper, The Independent Age. In 1896, Hutchins was elected to a term in the Tennessee Legislature.26 Although he only served one term, he was successful in passing a law repealing Chattanooga’s poll tax. In 1888, Hutchins returned to his law practice, continued editing The Independent Age and even became an ordained minister. But his greatest claim to fame was yet to come, when he became involved in one of the most significant lynching cases in history.

In 1906, Hutchins and his law partner Noah Parden undertook the appeal of the rape conviction of a Black man named Ed Johnson. As chronicled in the compelling book “Contempt of Court,” after Johnson’s unjust conviction, Parden and Hutchins appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, fearing their client would be killed by a lynch mob. ing so, they became among the first Black lawyers to practice before the Court. Justice John Marshall Harlan agreed to consider their writ, issuing a stay of execution and ordering the Hamilton County sheriff and other Tennessee authorities to keep Johnson safe. Despite this and with local newspapers openly calling for vigilantism, Sheriff Joseph Shipp gave all of his deputies the night off. The sheriff watched as a lynch mob numbering in the hundreds broke into the jail, and beat and hanged Ed Johnson. After desecrating Johnson’s body, a member of the mob pinned a note to it reading “To Justice Harlan, Come get your n______ now.”27

In a historic move—the first direct contempt proceeding ever tried before the U.S. Supreme Court—the Court tried Sheriff Joseph Shipp and others, finding them guilty of contempt of court.28 Although the defendants served fairly brief sentences, the case marked a watershed moment in U.S. legal history. At a time when the Court had previously been reluctant to extend Bill of Rights protections to state court proceedings, over the next 60 years after the Shipp case, federal courts became increasingly amenable to exercising their power to safeguard individual rights from wayward state authorities.29

In the aftermath of the case, both Parden and Hutchins endured considerable threats and harassment, and both left the state. Parden moved to East St. Louis, where he eventually became an assistant state’s attorney. Hutchins moved to Illinois, but he soon left the practice of law and returned to the barbershop trade he had learned from his father.30 Portraits of both Parden and Hutchins have adorned the walls of the Supreme Court of Georgia since June 2000,31 and in September 2021, the city of Chattanooga dedicated a statue to Hutchins, Parden and their client Ed Johnson, near the same Walnut Street Bridge from which Johnson was lynched.32

Judson Whitlocke Lyons

As Styles Hutchins was starting over in Tennessee, another Black lawyer came on the scene to be admitted to practice in Georgia. Born enslaved in Richmond County, Georgia, in 1860, Judson Whitlocke Lyons taught himself how to read and write after Emancipation. He gained an education, eventually studying at both Augusta Theological Institute and Atlanta Baptist Seminary—the predecessor institutions to Morehouse College. After graduation, he attended Howard University Law School, graduating in 1884.33 With his admission to the Georgia Bar later that year, Lyons became the first “Morehouse Man” to practice law. In fact, today, Morehouse’s honorary body of those who have gone on to distinguish themselves in the legal profession is named for him—the Judson Lyons Society.

Lyons formed a partnership in 1896 with another Black lawyer in Augusta, Henry Moses Porter.34 Porter, a University of Michigan Law School graduate, handled a number of high-profile cases, and is credited as the first Black lawyer to argue a case before the Supreme Court of Georgia. Lyons became best known not for his courtroom skills, but for his civil rights advocacy and political organizing. Lyons helped found the Georgia Equal Rights Association, one of the state’s first civil rights organizations. A major player in the Republican Party, Lyons was a delegate to the 1896 Republican National Convention, where he was a prominent supporter of the eventual candidate (and president), William McKinley. Lyons’ support was rewarded with an appointment as registrar of the U.S. Treasury, making him one of the highest ranking Black Americans serving in the federal government. He is one of only five Black individuals whose signatures have appeared on U.S. currency. Lyons was reappointed in 1901. After leaving public service in 1906, he returned to Augusta and became president of Haines Institute, a private school for the Black community. Lyons remained active in community service until his death in 1924.

Growing Numbers

As the 19th century came to a close, the rolls of Georgia Black lawyers continued to grow, albeit incrementally. From Savannah to Macon, from Columbus to Atlanta, Black practitioners would steadily make inroads to become members of “the noble profession.” Charles Henry James Taylor, admitted in 1888, would build a “large and lucrative practice” in the capital city. John H. Kinckle Jr. was one of the first Savannah practitioners to enjoy success in the “Hostess City of the South.” D.J. Pledger, admitted in 1884, made great strides in education, becoming dean of Morris Brown College. It would be another 35 years, however, before the first attempt at admission by a Black female lawyer, and still almost another quarter of a century before Rachel Pruden Herndon would be admitted to the State Bar of Texas Litigation Section. In 2020, his efforts led to the posthumous bar admission of J.H. Williams, a Black man who was denied a law license in 1882 on racial grounds. Browning has been involved in similar campaigns around the country.

Conclusion

By virtue of their very presence as Black professionals in a society unaccustomed to viewing those of their race as anything other than “lesser,” lawyers like Styles Hutchins and Judson Lyons sent a powerful message to Blacks and white people alike. They dared to seek entry into a profession at a time when one white judge openly declared that the concept of admitting “a Negro upon social professional equality with white men was an innovation hardly to be tolerated.” Great lawyers emerged after World War II to win the critical battles of the civil rights movement, but they stood on the broad shoulders of giants, whose great legacy lives in us all.

Law Day Past and Present

Law Day, held annually on May 1, is a national day set aside to celebrate the rule of law. Law Day provides an opportunity to understand how law and the legal process protect our liberty, strive to achieve justice and contribute to the freedoms that all Americans share.

BY DENISE M. WARNER

The State Bar of Georgia’s Professionalism Committee collaborated with the Bar’s Local and Voluntary Bars Committee to participate in Law Day 2022. Law Day is held on May 1 every year to celebrate the rule of law in our society and to cultivate a deeper understanding of the legal profession.

The Law Day 2022 theme was “Toward a More Perfect Union: The Constitution in Times of Change.” Elected or appointed public officials from each of Georgia’s 10 judicial districts were invited to visit schools throughout the state to discuss the Law Day theme. The Professionalism Committee created talking points for the officials to focus on three issues: 1) a brief history of the U.S. Constitution; 2) reflecting on the best interests of U.S. citizens; and 3) comparing the 1791 ratification of the First Amendment with the historic implementation of the First Amendment.

The Local and Voluntary Bars Committee, chaired by Hon. Ashley Palmer, invited participation from various judges and lawyers who are public officials.

This year, the committees will focus on the American Bar Association’s 2023 theme: “Cornerstones of Democracy: Civics, Civility and Collaboration.” Elected officials and attorneys from Georgia’s 10 judicial districts will be invited to discuss this year’s theme by visiting a high school government class or serving as a guest speaker at a civic association meeting.

Middle school and high school students will be encouraged to submit either a one- to two-page essay or a 30-second social media video focusing on the Law Day theme. Middle school students will receive a certificate of achievement, while the high school students will compete for a coveted $100 certificate and rights of accomplishment.

State Bar of Georgia members are encouraged to participate in this year’s Law Day by discussing the “Cornerstone of Democracy: Civics, Civility and Collaboration” theme with their community, including, but not limited to: school groups, Rotary Clubs, Kiwanis, and fraternity and sorority associations. While Law Day is officially observed on May 1 of each year, Law Day projects are held throughout the month of May. Therefore, lawyers or judges who are interested in participating may schedule a Law Day presentation during days and times that best fit their schedules during the month of May.

The construction of architect E. C. Hosford’s grand 1907 courthouse at Eastman marks the end of an era for Dodge County. The saga of the three and a half decades before this building was erected is a compelling tale of the transformation of a vast and virtually uninhabited wilderness of virgin pine into the lumber empire of two notable northern entrepreneurs, William E. Dodge and William Pitt Eastman, who in 1869, established The Georgia Land and Lumber Company. The company soon owned more than 400,000 acres of virgin forest including most of the land between the Oconee and the Ocmulgee Rivers extending southward from Laurens, Telfair, Pulaski and Montgomery counties to the confluence of these two streams where the Altamaha River begins.

In 1870, Dodge County was created, and the new village of Eastman soon gained a notable reputation as a winter resort for northern tourists. But by 1880, The Georgia Land and Lumber Company had “transformed a bucolic former resort into a noisy timber colony.” As the fingers of tiny tram railroads spread throughout the region between the two great rivers, Dodge built two enormous lumber mills: one at Normandale, south of Eastman, and one on the Ocmulgee River at Wilcox Lake. Finished lumber was shipped down The Macon and Brunswick Railroad and logs were floated down the Ocmulgee and the Altamaha to Darien where they were nursed by steam tugs to The Dodge Lumber Company’s great new mills on Saint Simon’s Island.

Eastman and Dodge brought to Georgia enormous sums of that scarce commodity which New South promoters would later term “Northern capital.” But as their story unfolded, it became clear that, despite their capital investments in the area’s future, Eastman and Dodge were far from unilaterally welcome in the county which bore Dodge’s name. William Eastman’s great land purchase and William Dodge’s magnificent entrepreneurial empire of timber and rail were the target of one of the largest and most persistent legal actions in Georgia’s history. In a series of cases that lasted from 1877 to 1923, Dodge and his heirs were continually in court defending title to their domain against hundreds of claimants. This period was punctuated by evictions, injunctions, intimidation and even a brutal murder. All attempts to discredit Dodge’s title failed. As the battle raged, the people of Dodge County elected officials who opposed the man for whom the county was named, developed a thoroughly unhealthy opinion of the federal justice system and became further entrenched in their prejudices against northern men of business.

William Dodge died in 1883, leaving his vast empire in Georgia in the hands of his son, Norman. The year before, The East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroad had acquired the failed Macon and Brunswick Railroad and built northward from Macon to Rome, thus linking South Georgia’s vast timber lands to the timber-hungry cities of the American interior. A new wave of lumbering began, and large mills popped up across Dodge County. By 1906, all the vast stands of virgin timber were gone from Dodge County, and the heirs of William Dodge had begun to sell his empire piecemeal. The great mill at Normandale had burned in 1892, never to be rebuilt. Other large mills at Empire and Eastman were dismantled and moved to Southwest Georgia. The age of exploitation was passing as farmers converted the denuded timberland into fields of cotton. As if to symbolize the end of “King Timber” and the rise of “King Cotton,” Eastman erected a turn-of-the-century cotton mill on the site of the enormous Eastman Lumber Company’s mill, which had been abandoned in 1900.
Norman Dodge died in 1907, the year this courthouse was completed. The Eastman Times Journal claimed that Dodge had once been “the largest single landowner in Georgia.” But times were changing, the lumber barons were gone, cotton covered the county and Eastman’s population was nearing 3,000. In this atmosphere of impending high times, Dodge County looked to Atlanta architect, Ed Hosford, to design a new courthouse to replace the county’s original frame court building, which had been a gift back in 1874 from none other than William E. Dodge. The bond issue to fund the new courthouse was passed by the seemingly impossible margin of 2,029 for, 65 against.

By early March of 1906, the Dodge County Commissioners had delegated a committee to inspect various new court buildings across the state. Not surprisingly the unanimous choice for a model was James Wingfield Golucke’s stunning Coweta County Courthouse at Newnan, which had been completed only two years before. On March 8, 1908, The Eastman Times Journal lists C. C. Hosford of Empire, Georgia, as a member of the building committee. Predictably on April 19, after “many of the leading architects of the state” submitted proposals, the committee announced the selection of C. C. Hosford’s son, Ed C. Hosford of Atlanta, as architect. Rumors circulated in Eastman that J. W. Golucke would supervise the project, but E. C. Hosford denied this, stating that the work would be his alone, and that he would move to Eastman to supervise the work.

Ed C. Hosford did eventually move back to Eastman. He went on to design at least eight more court buildings: two in Georgia—the 1909 Harris County Courthouse at Hamilton and the 1917 Wheeler County Courthouse at Alamo—two in Texas and at least four in Florida including the 1909 Jefferson County Courthouse at Monticello, Florida, which was quite similar to his effort in Eastman. Hosford was also the architect of an extensive remodeling of the Bulloch County Courthouse in 1914.

Although competent, Hosford’s work never had Golucke’s unique flair. Hosford borrowed from Golucke in fashioning a great horizontal mass with a central portico and flanking wings, but the results here in Eastman are ordinary at best. Today, Hosford’s courthouse at Eastman is difficult to assess, for in 1939 the building was completely gutted by a devastating fire which swept through the central section causing the grand lantern to collapse and destroying the porticos at the center of the structure. The building was rebuilt to function like the original, but gone are the great clock tower and the monumental columns of the main entranceways. Only the columned side porticos remain, serving thereafter as the main entrance.

In 1906, like so many Georgia towns, Eastman saw itself on the edge of a new era of prosperity, but disappointment lay ahead. As Hosford’s courthouse rose, cotton was proving a capricious provider.

Meet Your New Computer Overlords

What are the ethics implications of artificial intelligence like ChatGPT?

BY PAULA FREDERICK

Mesmerized by the computer screen, your partner doesn’t even look up as you enter his office. “Have you tried this?” he asks, turning the monitor so you can read along. “This ChatGPT is amazing! I asked it to write a demand letter in one of my cases. It came up with a pretty good draft in about three seconds!”

“I’ve tried it too,” you admit. “You have to be careful—I asked it an ethics question and it gave me an answer that was only partly right. It didn’t catch that Georgia’s Rules of Professional Conduct aren’t the same as the ABA Model.”

“That’s just detail!” your partner explains. “You have to admit it’s at least a great starting point. It could save us lots of time—maybe we can do without that intern we’ve been considering!”

“Not so fast,” you answer. “Do you even understand how it works? How do we know whether we’re getting accurate information from this thing—every day it gives a different answer to the exact same question! And even if we’re sure it’s accurate, would we have to tell our clients we were using it?”

What are the ethics implications of artificial intelligence like ChatGPT? We asked ChatGPT to answer that question, and here’s what it said:

As an AI language model, ChatGPT can be a useful tool for lawyers in many ways, such as conducting legal research, drafting legal documents and communicating with clients. However, there are several ethical issues that lawyers should consider when using ChatGPT:

1. Confidentiality: Lawyers have a duty to maintain the confidentiality of their clients’ information. When using ChatGPT, lawyers should ensure that they do not disclose any confidential information to the AI model or anyone else who may have access to the conversation.

2. Competence: Lawyers have a duty to provide competent representation to their clients. When using ChatGPT, lawyers should ensure that they have the necessary knowledge and skills to use the AI model effectively and accurately.

3. Unauthorized Practice of Law: Lawyers have a duty to avoid engaging in the unauthorized practice of law. When using ChatGPT, lawyers should ensure that they are not providing legal advice or services beyond their jurisdiction or expertise.

4. Bias and Fairness: ChatGPT, like any machine learning model, may have inherent biases based on the data it was trained on. Lawyers should be aware of these biases and take steps to ensure that they do not contribute to unfair or discriminatory outcomes.

5. Informed Consent: Lawyers have a duty to obtain informed consent from their clients before using technology that may affect their representation. When using ChatGPT, lawyers should inform their clients of the risks and limitations associated with using the AI model and obtain their consent before proceeding.

Overall, lawyers should use ChatGPT in a manner that upholds their ethical obligations to their clients, the legal profession and the justice system. They should also stay informed about emerging ethical issues related to the use of AI in law and adapt their practices accordingly.

Pretty good, huh?

The “intelligence” behind ChatGPT and similar programs is still evolving. For the time being, lawyers should use this AI the same as any basic, fill-in-the-blank form found online—as a potentially time-saving starting point that needs to be double-checked and adapted before use.

So don’t fire those associates just yet...
Disbarments
Edward Hine Jr.
139 Shoals Ferry Road SE
Rome, GA 30161
Admitted to the Bar 1976

On Oct. 4, 2022, the Supreme Court of Georgia accepted the petition of Edward Hine Jr. (State Bar No. 355775) for voluntary surrender of his license, which is tantamount to disbarment. The disciplinary matter came before the Court on Hine’s petition which was filed before the issuance of a formal complaint but after the Court rejected an earlier petition for voluntary discipline.

In this petition, Hine admitted that, in connection with two client matters, he violated Rules 1.4, 1.8 (a), 1.15 (I) (a) and 1.15 (II) (b) of the Georgia Rules of Professional Conduct. The maximum sanction for a violation of Rules 1.4 and 1.8 (a) is a public reprimand, and the maximum sanction for a violation of Rules 1.15 (I) (a) and 1.15 (II) (b) is disbarment. Although Hine set out some factors in mitigation of discipline, he acknowledged the seriousness of his misconduct justified the surrender of his license.

In Hine I, Hine admitted that in November 2018, he was appointed as executor of a client’s estate; that he deposited the estate’s funds into his trust account; and that he used those funds to pay the estate’s expenses and to make distributions to the estate’s beneficiaries. Hine further admitted that, without the consent of the estate’s beneficiaries, he transferred $129,071.50 from the funds that had been entrusted to him to his operating account, despite the fact that, as of that time, the fees and expenses that Hine had charged to the estate totaled only $59,363.50, and that he considered the difference between the earned fees and allocated funds to be a loan. Hine asserted that he intended to repay the loan before making the final distributions to the estate’s beneficiaries, but that he failed to repay the entire amount of the loan such that the final distribution to the beneficiaries in 2020, caused an overdraft of $3,344.31 in his trust account—an overdraft that he covered with personal funds. Subsequently, Hine reported the matter to the State Bar and sent a letter explaining the situation to the estate’s beneficiaries.

Although not admitted in Hine I, Hine admitted in his petition that he was aware of the loan and repeatedly permitted him to defer repayment of the loan, the wife passed away in September 2018, and Hine presented no documentation proving either of those facts. Regardless, Hine admitted that he remained the trustee of the trust and the obligor on the note for years and that, upon the passing of the client’s wife, he paid the balances of the proceeds of the trust to the college named as the remainder beneficiary, but did not forward to the remainder beneficiary the $85,000 plus interest that he owed the trust pursuant to the note until 2021, after he was prompted to do so as a result of the Bar’s investigation into the estate matter.
Hine admitted that by his actions, he violated Rule 1.4 in that he failed to adequately consult with his clients as to matters; Rule 1.8 in that there was no evidence that he had ever obtained informed consent from any of the interested parties prior to borrowing money from the sums entrusted to his care; Rule 1.15 (I) (a) in that he commingled funds over which he had a fiduciary duty and converted them to his own use; and Rule 1.15 (II) (b) in that he withdrew funds belonging to the estate and trust accounts over and above attorney fees he had actually earned and never debited those funds against the accounts of the clients, eventually having to deposit significant personal funds into his trust account to make up shortfalls in the clients’ accounts. Further, Hine acknowledged that under the ABA Standards for Imposing Lawyer Sanctions, to which the Court looks for guidance in deciding disciplinary cases, the intentional nature of his conduct coupled with the fact that his conduct had the potential to seriously harm his clients called for the presumptive punishment for his actions to be disbarment. Hine listed his substantial experience in the practice of law as a factor in aggravation of discipline, but also asserted in mitigation that he had no prior disciplinary history despite 45 years in the practice of law; that he made a timely and good faith effort to rectify the consequences of his misconduct; that he had demonstrated a cooperative attitude in these disciplinary proceedings; and that he had otherwise exhibited good character, integrity and a positive reputation in the community. Nevertheless, he asserted that the seriousness of his misconduct justified the surrender of his license. The State Bar filed a response to the petition agreeing with his recitation of the facts and arguing that the law supported the loss of his license.

Franklin David McCrea
418 W. 15th St.
P.O. Box 412
Alma, GA 31510
Admitted to the Bar 1992

On Oct. 4, 2022, the Supreme Court of Georgia disbarred attorney Franklin David McCrea (State Bar No. 486850) from the practice of law in Georgia. The disciplinary matter came before the Court on a consolidated report and recommendation by the special master addressing two formal complaints and recommending that the Court disbar McCrea for his violation of the Georgia Rules of Professional Conduct in connection with two client matters.

The record reflected that after the State Bar filed its two complaints, which were docketed as State Disciplinary Board Docket (SDBD) Nos. 7322 and 7448, McCrea participated in the disciplinary proceedings initially, but for 17 months leading up to the Court’s order, it appeared he ignored the proceedings. Specifically, in connection with SDBD No. 7322, he failed to respond to the notice of investigation and, although he acknowledged service of the formal complaint, he failed to file a timely answer. In response to the State Bar’s motion for default, however, he admitted he had no defense to the allegations. In connection with SDBD 7448, McCrea filed an inadequate response to the notice of investigation and, after being personally served with the formal complaint in April 2021, filed an untimely answer to the formal complaint in August 2021, in which he admitted most of the facts and all of the rules violations alleged.

In March 2022, the State Bar moved for judgment on the pleadings, and McCrea failed to respond. In his response to the Bar’s motion for default in SDBD 7322 and in his untimely answer in SDBD 7448, McCrea sought an opportunity to present mitigating evidence, but he ultimately failed to respond to the special master’s and the Bar’s counsel’s lengthy efforts to set up a hearing. Ultimately, the special master granted the motion for default and the motion for judgment on the pleadings.

Based on McCrea’s admissions and his default, the following facts appeared. In connection with SDBD 7322, McCrea represented a client in 2018 in a federal criminal matter in which the client entered a guilty plea. The client retained appellate counsel to pursue post-conviction remedies, and appellate counsel contacted McCrea in late November 2018, asking that McCrea provide him with the client’s complete file. McCrea never provided the client’s file to appellate counsel, and the client’s appeal was ultimately dismissed. In connection with SDBD 7448, McCrea was retained to represent a client in obtaining an uncontested divorce and was paid a flat fee of $950, but he failed to respond to inquiries from his client regarding the status of the case. In late November 2018, McCrea sent his client an email stating that he would call later that afternoon and that the divorce would be final by January 2019 at the latest. However, the divorce was never finalized by McCrea, and the client retained another attorney to finalize the divorce.

The special master determined, and the Court agreed, that by this conduct, McCrea violated Rules 1.2, 1.3, 1.4 (a) (3), 1.4 (a) (4), 1.16 (d) and 9.3 of the Georgia Rules of Professional Conduct. The maximum sanction for a violation of Rules 1.2 (a) and 1.3 is disbarment, and the maximum sanction for a violation of the remaining rules is a public reprimand. The special master determined that the following aggravating circumstances were present: multiple offenses and substantial experience in the practice of law. The special master noted that McCrea’s lack of prior discipline was the sole mitigating factor and noted that McCrea was given the opportunity to present evidence of mitigating circumstances at the hearing but concluded that he waived that opportunity by failing to respond to the special master’s and Bar’s efforts to set up a hearing. The special master concluded that disbarment was the appropriate sanction for an attorney who abandoned his client and failed to respond to disciplinary authorities. The Court agreed that disbarment was the appropriate sanction and was consistent with prior cases in which an attorney had, indisputably, violated provisions of the Rules that carry disbarment as a sanction and failed to participate fully in the disciplinary process.

Suspensions
Trent Lee Coggins
108 E. College St.
Valdosta, GA 31602
Admitted to the Bar 2001

On Oct. 4, 2022, the Supreme Court of Georgia accepted attorney Trent Lee Coggins’ (State Bar No. 173299) petition for voluntary discipline and imposed a suspension of six months nunc pro tunc to Sept. 1, 2021. The disciplinary matter came before the Court on the report of the special master recommending that the Court accept the petition for voluntary discipline filed by Coggins after the filing of a formal complaint. Coggins asked the court to impose the suspension for his admitted violations of Rules 1.15 (I) (a)–(b) and 1.15 (II) (a)–(c) of the Georgia Rules of Professional Conduct. The maximum penalty for a violation of Rules 1.15 (I) and 1.15 (II) (a) and (b) is disbarment, and the maximum penalty for a violation of Rule 1.15 (II) (c) is a public reprimand.

In his report, the special master made the following findings of fact: Coggins owned his own practice and represented clients in commercial and residential real estate transactions, acting at times as a closing attorney, and receiving and disbursing client and third-party funds required to be held in IOLTA accounts. Coggins maintained two IOLTA accounts with Guardian Bank of Valdosta. On May 27, 2016, Coggins acted as the closing attorney on the sale of four residential lots owned by Palm Beach Development, LLC, (PBD) which were part of a 41-lot parcel owned by PBD. At the time of the sale and thereafter, Coggins’ client was the sole member of PBD. Several years prior to the sale, in 2010, the client borrowed $136,555.24 from a third party (the Loan). Although Coggins was not involved in either the origination or the closing of the Loan, he understood that the Loan was secured by PBD’s ownership interest in the 41-lot parcel and that his client had provided the third party with a security deed to the 41 lots as collateral for the Loan. Additionally, prior to the May 2016 closing, Coggins was present and overheard a telephone conversation between his client and the third party in which they discussed applying the proceeds of the sale of the four lots towards repayment of the Loan. Coggins believed that the third party would release the four lots from the security deed upon application of the proceeds of the sale of those lots toward repayment of the Loan. Indeed, in connection with this disciplinary matter, the third party represented to the State Bar that he agreed to accept the proceeds of the sale of the four lots as payment towards the debt. Coggins’ client also affirmatively represented in an affidavit to the State Bar that he agreed to accept the proceeds of the sale of the four lots as payment towards the debt. Coggins’ client also affirmatively represented in an affidavit to the State Bar that, at the time of the May 2016 closing, he was under the impression that a written release was sent to the third party. The client further represented to the State Bar that in June 2017, the third party acknowledged having received a release. However, notwithstanding the client’s representations to the State Bar, Coggins admitted that the record in this case does not include a written release, and no such release ever existed.

Following the closing on May 27, 2016, Coggins deposited $49,898.91 into one of his IOLTA accounts at Guardian Bank which amount represented the gross proceeds from the sale of the four lots. On the same day, Coggins wrote several checks from his IOLTA account in connection with the closing, including Check No. 5016 in the amount of $33,096.94 made payable to the third party, which Coggins understood would be applied as partial repayment of the Loan. According to the third party, sometime after the closing in 2016, he attempted to negotiate...
Check No. 5016 at a Regions Bank, but the teller informed him that the IOLTA account did not have sufficient funds for the check to be honored. More than a year later, in June 2017, the third party contacted Coggins’ client and requested a replacement check, representing that Check No. 5016 had been dishonored by the bank due to the length of time that had elapsed since it was issued. The client told the third party that he would request a replacement check from Coggins, but the client did not do so.

Almost three years later, on May 14, 2019, the third party, through counsel, sent Coggins a written demand to replace Check No. 5016, maintaining that the check had been dishonored for insufficient funds. Coggins contacted the third party’s counsel and offered to tender the amount of the check (i.e., $33,096.94) immediately, but the third party refused the offer, purportedly in order to pressure Coggins’ client to repay the full amount due on the loan. On May 30, 2019, the third party commenced foreclosure proceedings against the 41-lot parcel, setting July 2, 2019, as the date of the non-judicial foreclosure sale. The day before the sale, Coggins, on behalf of his client, wired $208,853.15 from his IOLTA account to the third party in settlement of the loan. The third party and Coggins’ client agreed that $33,096.94 of the $208,853.15 would satisfy the net proceeds due to third party in his IOLTA account at all times and keep those funds separate from his own funds, and by failing to keep and preserve complete records of those funds held in his IOLTA account. In addition, Coggins admitted that he violated Rule 1.15 (I) (b) when he disregarded the third party’s interest in the $33,096.94 by not maintaining it at all times in the IOLTA account and by not keeping it separate from his personal funds. Moreover, he admitted to violating Rule 1.15 (II) (a) by administering part of the funds held for the third party in his IOLTA account to someone other than the third party without authorization. He also admitted to violating Rule 1.15 (II) (b) by depositing funds into the IOLTA account; holding personal funds in his IOLTA account beyond the time when they were earned; failing to maintain a ledger for the IOLTA account showing the balances held for each client or third person; and withdrawing funds from the IOLTA account for personal use that were not earned fees debited against the account of a specific client and recorded as such. Finally, Coggins admitted that he violated rule 1.15 (II) (c) in that the funds he held in the IOLTA account were not available for the third party to withdraw upon request without delay.

The special master relied on the ABA Standards for Imposing Lawyer Sanctions for guidance in determining the appropriate level of punishment noting he considered the duties violated, Coggins’ mental state, the actual or potential injury caused by his misconduct, and the aggravating and mitigating factors. As for his mental state, the special master concluded that Coggins admitted that he knowingly and intentionally misused client and third-party funds to prevent the failure of his business venture, but that some of his violations also arose from his failure to appreciate the importance of trust account management. The special master concluded that given the third party’s apparent inaction for three years, it did not appear he had suffered any actual injury in 2016 when he may or may not have attempted to negotiate Check No. 5016; however, even assuming that he never tried to cash the check, the special master concluded that the third party still suffered some actual injury when the $33,096.94 went unpaid for a period of time following his counsel’s specific, written demand for payment. As for potential injury, the special master also noted that Coggins admitted that the third party was exposed to potential financial harm by virtue of Coggins not maintaining sufficient funds to cover Check No. 5016 at all relevant times; that the owners of the four lots were also exposed to injury when the third-party’s counsel initiated non-judicial foreclosure against those properties; and that the deficit in the trust account had the potential to undermine the integrity of the significant funds Coggins held on deposit for numerous clients and third persons between 2016 and 2019.

As for aggravating factors, the special master considered Coggins’ substantial experience in the practice of law and his dishonest and selfish motive in using client funds to pay for his business interests. As for mitigating factors, the special master considered Coggins’ personal problems—primarily his lapse of judgment in fearing public humiliation—which the special master concluded provided a limited degree of mitigation and the fact that Coggins made a timely, good faith effort to make restitution and rectify the consequences of his misconduct. In addition, the special master noted that Coggins had submitted character references that attested to his professionalism, integrity and commitment to public services, and that he had shown genuine remorse.

As for the level of discipline the special master determined that while the Court views trust account violations as exceptionally serious and the maximum penalty for any single violation of Rules 1.15 (I) or 1.15 (II) is disbarment, disbarment is generally reserved for the most egregious circumstances. The special master concluded that in marked contrast, where the totality of the circumstances supported less severe discipline, the Court has without hesitation imposed a suspension or reprimand for trust account violation. Here, the special master concluded that Coggins’ misconduct, although certainly serious, was mitigated by a number of considerations that tended to offset or deemphasize the aggravating factors, including his restitution, general acceptance of responsibility, remorse and lack of any prior disciplinary history. Thus, the special master deemed that a six-month suspension was appropriate. Moreover, the special master concluded that it would be appropriate for the suspension to be imposed nunc pro tunc to Sept. 1, 2021, the date that Coggins stopped practicing law by closing his law office and his trust accounts and withdrawing properly from all representations. The State Bar did not oppose this recommendation, and the Court accepted Coggins’ petition.

William DeForest Thompson Jr.
306 51st St.
Vienna, WV 26105
Admitted to the Bar 2003

On Oct. 25, 2022, the Supreme Court of Georgia accepted attorney William DeForest Thompson Jr.’s (State Bar No. 710152) amended petition for voluntary reciprocal discipline after the Court rejected the first petition and imposed a suspension of one year, nunc pro tunc to Jan. 8, 2020. In his amended petition, Thompson whose license was also inactive for failure to pay his license fee, asked the Court to impose a one-year suspension, to be imposed retroactively, as substantially similar discipline to the one-year suspension, plus probation, that he received in Florida for mismanaging his trust account.

In his amended petition, Thompson admitted that he was suspended from the practice of law in Florida for one year, effective Jan. 8, 2020, to be followed by two years on “probation,” for misconduct involving the mismanagement of his trust account. He was also required to attend a trust accounting workshop to pay costs incurred by The Florida Bar related to the disciplinary matter, and to pay restitution to the client. On Aug. 19, 2021, the Florida Supreme Court reinstated his law license based on his compliance with those terms, although he remained subject to the period of probation. He was required to pay a quarterly monitoring fee to the Florida Bar and certify that he no longer maintained a trust account and that he was not required to do so based on the nature of his practice. He included with his amended petition evidence that he was in compliance with the terms of his probation. While Thompson was under the one-year suspension, he received a public reprimand for violating Florida Bar Rule 3-5.1 (h) for what he claims was his failure to take down social media sites operated by his firm after he was placed on emergency suspension preceding the one-year suspension.

Regarding the conduct leading to his one-year suspension, Thompson admitted the following facts, as ratified and adopted by the Florida referee in his report and approved by the Florida Supreme Court. In January 2019, The Florida Bar conducted an internal audit, which revealed that his paralegal had acted criminally by stealing from office accounts and mishandling client funds. He admitted that he was responsible for his paralegal’s misconduct and his own negligence in supervising the accounts. Based on his misconduct, Thompson was found to have violated several Florida Bar Rules. Moreover, at the time of the Florida disciplinary proceedings, Thompson’s trust account contained $12,323.52 owed to clients, with a trust account shortfall of $5,834.44 representing a cost advance paid by a client. As part of his discipline, Thompson agreed to the distribution of the remaining trust account funds with the shortage of $5,834.44 to be paid by Thompson as restitution to the client.

Thompson further admitted that the Florida referee identified as aggravating factors that there was a pattern of misconduct, multiple offenses and that he had substantial experience in the practice of law. As for mitigating factors, the Florida referee considered the absence of a prior disciplinary record, the absence of a dishonest or selfish motive, his cooperative attitude toward the proceedings, and his good character and reputation. Thompson stated that his admitted conduct would be a violation of Georgia Rules of Professional Conduct (GRPC) 8.4,
Thompson stated that the Court had the authority to impose discipline substantially similar to his one-year Florida suspension, with reinstatement being conditioned upon proof of reinstatement in Florida. He added that Florida’s imposition of probation, which is unavailable in Georgia, did not preclude the Court from recognizing the one-year suspension as substantially similar, as this Court had previously approved reciprocal suspensions of the same length as those imposed in Florida, along with proof of readmission in Florida, as substantially similar discipline. The Bar also stated that although Thompson’s license status in Georgia remained inactive and not in good standing, he had made substantial efforts to mitigate the problem by communicating with the State Bar’s Membership Department. The Bar concluded that Thompson’s amended petition included substantial evidence that indicated his compliance with the Supreme Court of Florida’s Consent Judgment, his probation requirements and an understanding of the GRPC.

Accordingly, the Court accepted Thompson’s amended petition for voluntary reciprocal discipline and suspended him from the practice of law for one year, nunc pro tunc to Jan. 8, 2020, and noted that Thompson would remain under an administrative suspension due to his failure to pay his license fee until his successful completion of all the terms and conditions as set forth in Bar Rule 1-501 (b).

Public Reprimand
Karen Lynn Pass
3301 Buckeye Road, Suite 305
Atlanta, GA 30341
Admitted to the Bar 1994

On Oct. 4, 2022, the Supreme Court of Georgia ordered that attorney Karen Lynn Pass (Bar No. 480920) receive a public reprimand with conditions for her violations of Rules 1.15 (I) (a), 1.15 (II) (b) and 5.3 (b) of the Georgia Rules of Professional Conduct (GRPC).

Two disciplinary matters came before the Court on the consolidated report submitted by the special master who recommended the Court impose a public reprimand with conditions. According to the special master, the matter underlying S22Y1156 arose from a formal complaint charging Pass with violating a number of rules during her representation of an individual in a personal injury matter. But the special master found that clear and convincing evidence showed only that Pass had deposited funds from the settlement of her client’s case into her IOLTA account at a time when the account also held funds belonging to at least one other client and that Pass admittedly kept no ledgers or other records from which she would be able to tell at any given time the actual amount of funds in her IOLTA account belonging to each client. Based on those facts, the special master concluded that Pass had violated Rules 1.15 (I) (a) and 1.15 (II) (b).

With regard to S22Y1176, the special master noted that it arose from a separate formal complaint charging Pass with violations of a variety of the GRPC during her representation of a client in an investigation she had agreed to undertake. After considering the evidence, however, the special master found that the Bar had shown, by clear and convincing evidence, only that Pass had taken money in advance from her client to be used for fees and expenses connected to an investigation she was to perform for the client; that she deposited the unearned expenses into her IOLTA account, but then failed to review, audit or otherwise reconcile that account; that unbeknownst to Pass, her office manager—a longtime friend and nonlawyer employee—was accessing Pass’ IOLTA account and obtaining funds via forged checks; and that, as a result, there were multiple times where Pass’ IOLTA account carried a balance that was less than the almost $4,000 she should have been holding in trust on her client’s behalf. The special master found that Pass was unaware of her employee’s illegal actions until several months after that employee left Pass’ employment, absconding with a firm computer and other office equipment and materials; that after discovering the thefts, Pass was able, over time, to restore enough of the stolen funds to replace the money she was required to return to her client; and that those funds have now been returned. The special master specifically noted that there was no allegation that Pass was involved in, or even contemporaneously knew of, her employee’s withdrawal of client’s funds from the IOLTA account. The special master concluded that Pass had violated Rules 1.15 (I) (a) and 5.3 (b).

With regard to discipline, the special master noted that the Court looks to the ABA Standards for Imposing Lawyer Sanctions for guidance and found that Pass’ violations in both cases implicated ABA Standard 4 (violations of duties owed to clients) in that Pass’ failure to properly monitor her trust account and her failure to properly supervise her nonlawyer employee both affected her ability to preserve her client’s property. The special master concluded, however, that Pass was merely negligent in her dealings with the IOLTA account and her clients’ funds, noting Pass’ testimony that she is primarily a criminal defense attorney and, therefore, rarely has client funds in her IOLTA account. He further concluded that Pass did not have the “conscious awareness of the nature or attendant circumstances” of the actions of her nonlawyer employee, and, at worst, was merely negligent in her supervision of that employee. With regard to injury or potential injury, the special master noted that although the funds of the client in S22Y1176 were taken from Pass’ IOLTA account, Pass did not steal those funds and, once the loss was discovered, she replaced them and returned the funds to her client. And, with regard to S22Y1156, the special master noted that there was no injury to the client in that none of that client’s funds were lost or misappropriated in any way. Ultimately, the special master concluded that there was no actual injury to either client but acknowledged that the potential for injury was present.

In terms of aggravating and mitigating factors, the special master noted, in aggravation, that Pass had one instance of prior discipline, having received a formal letter of admonition in 2011 related to a failure to communicate with a client, and that she had substantial experience in the practice of law, having been admitted to the Bar in 1994. In mitigation, he somewhat discounted Pass’ former discipline on the grounds that it did not involve her trust account or her failure to supervise a nonlawyer employee. He further noted that Pass had not acted with a dishonest or selfish motive; that she made a timely and good faith effort to rectify the consequences of the actions of her nonlawyer employee; that she made full and free disclosure to the State Bar; that she had a cooperative attitude during the proceedings; and that she had a good reputation in the legal community. The special master further noted that, although neither aggravating nor mitigating, neither client filed a grievance against Pass. The special master recommended that for her negligent violation of the rules cited above, that Pass receive a public reprimand and that she consult with the Law Practice Management Program of the Bar within 60 days after the Court’s opinion and follow its recommendations concerning her law practice. Neither side filed exceptions contesting the special master’s factual findings, legal conclusions and recommendations. The Court agreed that a public reprimand was appropriate and sufficient to act as a penalty to Pass, a deterrent to other lawyers, and as an indication to the public that the courts will maintain the ethics of the profession and ordered that she receive a public reprimand with the recommended condition. •

Better Clients Are a Compelling Brand Away

Creating your authentic brand is the foundation of a strong marketing strategy that consistently puts you in front of ideal clients.

BY NKOYO-ENE R. EFFIONG

It is the second month of 2023, are you attracting the type of clients you want? If your answer is no, it might be time to revisit your law firm branding.

There are more than 1.3 million active lawyers practicing in the United States alone. As of October 2022, there are more than 40,000 active members in good standing of the State Bar of Georgia—the lion’s share of whom are practicing in some capacity. How will your ideal client know that you are the right attorney for them in a sea of seemingly similar lawyers and law firms?

Branding.

We are not just talking about your business cards, logo or color schemes. We are talking about the personality of your law practice. The feeling legal consumers get when they interact with your marketing, enter your (virtual) office and otherwise engage with your company. Branding is the process of creating a distinct identity for your business in the mind of consumers. Without a strong brand, it is hard to attract the right clients and nearly impossible to stand out in a crowded market.

So how do you build a strong brand?
Get introspective.
Creating an enduring brand requires you to reflect on the reason you are running your own law practice in the first place. Why are you practicing law (beyond needing to repay your student loans)? What is your unique take on the practice of law? What do you want to accomplish with your own firm that you could not working for another law firm? What values or principles guide your work? What does your firm stand for and what makes it unique?

Questions like this will help you identify your brand promise (consistent customer experience), your values (how you do business, with who and for whom) and your brand story (the compelling narrative about your company and how it helps clients).

Be picky about who you represent.
One of the biggest mistakes attorneys make while growing their firms is not knowing who they (want to) serve. Spoiler alert—anyone with a legal problem who can pay your fee is not a target audience. If you want more of your dream clients, you have to define your target audience. A target audience is a specific group of consumers who are most likely to want your services and are attracted to your brand. A strong brand attracts and repels. Think iPhone vs. Android, PC vs. Mac. Each brand has its die-hard users and people who would not be caught dead with the product.

As the owner of your law practice, it is critical that you define your target audience and learn as much about your ideal client as possible. The more knowledgeable you are about your target audience, the more adept you will be at meeting them where they are and aligning your brand identity with the solutions they are seeking. Knowing your target audience also prevents you from spinning your wheels and chasing after clients who either are not a good fit or have no real interest in retaining your services. If you are unsure who your target audience is, review your past clients and identify those with whom you enjoyed working. What problem did you solve for them? What demographic and psychographic data points did they have in common? What expectations of a lawyer did they share? Once you are clear on your target audience, you can better shape your messaging and determine a marketing strategy that meets them where they are. Remember, you do not have to have everything to everyone. It is better if you are not.

Repeat yourself ... a lot.
It takes the average consumer upwards of seven touchpoints before they buy. Repetition matters. Once you have solidified your brand, you need to communicate it clearly and consistently. If there is one thing we know for sure, a confused mind does not buy. Therefore, it is important for you to communicate your brand story as simply and as frequently as possible. Your brand story is the compelling narrative about your brand and how it helps your ideal clients that to clearly communicate how you help your ideal clients solve their problems. If it is too complicated to understand how you can help, your ideal clients will tune out. If you do not communicate consistently, you will not remain top of mind. You must deliver a steady message to your target audience at regular intervals.

The Law Practice Management Program

Whether you need advice on technology, firm finances, organization or library materials, the Law Practice Management Program has the resources and training to assist you.

BY SHEILA BALDWIN

The Law Practice Management Program is one of the most valuable member benefits for State Bar of Georgia members. The Bar’s Law Practice Management (LPM) Program debuted in 1995 with a focused goal of supporting Georgia lawyers in the technological and business aspects of managing their practices. That was 27 years ago, when lawyers were replacing their IBM electric typewriters for laptops, phones were going wireless and marketing strategies moved online via company websites. Fast-forward to 2023, and one appreciates how much technological advances have affected law and business practices. Increasingly the practice of law requires legal, technological and business expertise. Since its inception, this member service has stepped in to assist Georgia attorneys in adapting their practices to a wide variety of innovations.

Nkoyo-Ene R. Effiong is the director of the Law Practice Management Program for the State Bar of Georgia. In that role, she helps Georgia lawyers tap into innovation to build a profitable and purpose-filled practice with less struggle and stress.

In case you have not made use of their services, you can access the Law Practice Management Program at www.gabar.org by selecting “Our Programs” and then “Law Practice Management Program” (see fig. 1). It’s suggested that you visit the website now to better understand the information in this article.
Law Practice Start Up Resources
The guide to starting your Georgia law practice is the program’s famous “Office Start Up Kit,” and it answers most of the questions about opening a practice in Georgia. The guide is updated with new or changing information and is available for in-person pick up or delivery by mail. For additional business planning advice, you can also set up an office visit to help review your business plan and consult on best practices for starting your practice. Call 404-527-8772 to set up an office visit.

Closing your Practice
Taking steps to create a succession plan is an essential step in ensuring that clients’ interests are protected when lawyers are unable to continue practicing law. Voluntary life events such as a job transition, or retirement, or involuntary situations like a lawyer’s illness, disability or untimely death often occur. As a courtesy of the State Bar of Georgia, LPM has provided closing law office guides which outline the steps a lawyer must take to protect his or her clients in the event of a sudden inability to continue in practice. These guides can also help attorneys establish an advance exit plan to invoke in the event of disability, retirement or death (see fig. 2).

Georgia Bar Journal Articles
Check out “Law Practice Management” by Nkoyo Effiong, “Member Benefits” by Sheila Baldwin and “Legal Tech Tips” co-written by Pro Bono Resource Center Director Mike Monahan and Nkoyo Effiong in the Georgia Bar Journal for articles that pertain to running your firm.

Consultations
General and technical consultations assist members on setting up and improving firm business systems, procedures and technology. A general consultation offers members an evaluation of your office’s existing office management procedures with a written assessment of the areas discussed and our consultant’s recommendations thereon. Technical consultations involve the selection of the best law office software applications and training materials.

Resource Library
The LPM Resource Library has a diverse selection of library materials to help your law firm run efficiently and are available for check out on-site at the Bar Center or through the online library catalog. We offer resources on a variety of topics related to law office management and technology, including starting a law practice, finance and accounting, marketing, law firm automation, human resource management, risk management, legal research and more. Use statebarga.library.site to register today (see fig. 3) or scan the QR code to get access.

We also have a variety of office management forms for download from the program’s main page. If you have questions about downloading these forms or have a request for a specific form not referenced on the list, contact LPM at 404-527-8772.

Solo and Small Firm Institute

The Case for More Self-Love in the Legal Profession

Self-care isn’t a luxury. You can’t love yourself if you aren’t willing to care for yourself.

BY JOY WHITE

“Loving yourself isn’t vanity; it’s sanity.”
—Katrina Mayer

These days, concepts like “self-love” and “self-care” are used almost daily on social media and mainstream media. Meanwhile, many lawyers are rushing from deadline to deadline without giving either of these concepts much consideration.

Unfortunately, many attorneys struggle to realize that they can’t love their work or anyone else until they love themselves. Even with countless self-help books, webinars, wellness coaches, gurus, religions, meditation, yoga and even CLEs, the legal profession can’t seem to embrace this fundamental concept of life: You can’t be happy until you love yourself; you can’t be satisfied until you love yourself; you can’t be balanced until you love yourself; and you can’t achieve true professional success until you love yourself.

What Is Self-Love?
Self-love is about accepting and loving yourself for who you are while ensuring your actions and behaviors follow suit. That said, it’s hard to love yourself when truly:

- You are your own worst critic.
- You judge yourself more harshly than you judge others.
• You engage in self-destructive habits and behaviors.
• You doubt your abilities.
• You question your worth.
• You engage in negative self-talk.

As members of the legal profession, “self-love” is essential for your mental and physical health, and though most of us claim to have a healthy amount of self-love, our actions say otherwise.

Self-love can be entirely different for different people, but what’s most important is whether or not you’re practicing a healthy amount of self-love and self-care as part of your daily routine.

Professional success and self-care are unrelated. We may think successful attorneys are the ones who don’t waste any time and always focus on their business. But by doing just that, what was satisfying before is no longer enough. What was excellent before can now feel like burnout and exhaustion.

To enjoy life and feel content with your actions, you must accept and recognize your efforts. Taking care of your well-being and making your and others’ mental health a priority can have a major impact your entire life.

Self-Care Is an Act of Self-Love
Self-care is exactly what it sounds like—caring for yourself and your needs. More importantly, though, self care is not selfish, greedy or indulgent.

We must make this clear because so many members of the legal profession struggle with this idea. We are so caught up in our careers, our clients and caring about our partners, children, family, friends and colleagues that we may find the thought of self-care to be indulgent.

This feeling of indulgence could not be further from the truth.

Self-care is vital, especially for attorneys. People find it harder to unwind and slow down. But, if you don’t care for your needs, you can suffer serious consequences like burnout, depression or anxiety. If you feel you suffer from one or more of these issues, please reach out to a trusted loved one.

Have you ever flown on a commercial flight? Flight attendants will tell you that oxygen masks will drop if things go wrong, and the airplane is depressurized. They stress the importance of putting your mask on first before you help others. After all, if you can’t breathe, you won’t be able to help the people around you. Instead of being helpful, you will soon find that you are the one in need of help.

While it is great that you want to be of service to your clients and the people in your life, it will eventually catch up to you if you consistently neglect your own well-being.

To truly love yourself, you need to prove it by treating yourself with care.

Write With the Court’s Needs in Mind

A strong legal writer composes documents with purpose that recognizes the needs of the audience. This installment of “Writing Matters” will help you to become a better persuasive writer by considering the needs of the judiciary when composing briefs and motions.

BY DAVID HRICIK AND KAREN J. SNEDDON

Goals inform approaches to all projects, including writing projects. For example, a goal of a court in deciding a motion or an appeal is, of course, to resolve the matter efficiently and correctly. Consequently, the goal of a legal writer should be to compose a brief or motion that persuades the court that the writer’s position is correct and do so in as few words as possible.

But courts have multiple goals, too. As an esteemed group of judges wrote, it is “not enough that a decision be correct ... .”1 This installment of “Writing Matters” describes other goals of judicial opinions, so that legal writers can become more persuasive.

The Goals of Judicial Opinions

It may seem axiomatic, but “it is through judicial opinions that courts communicate with litigants, lawyers, other courts, and the community.”2 This communication is critical because “the written word, in the end, is the source and the measure of the court’s authority.”3 As such, a court’s goal is not only to be correct, but “to explain and to persuade and to satisfy the world that the decision is principled and sound.”4

When judges write opinions, they consider the following questions: “Is there a reason for organizing the opinion this way? For including these particular facts? For discussing this issue at length? For citing this case?”5 They also know that “[m]issing significant facts or authorities is a mark of carelessness, and it undermines the opinion’s authority and integrity.”6 Considering these questions while writing can lead to better briefs and motions.

Does Your Writing Help the Court Draft a Favorable Opinion?
The following section unpacks each question and provides guidance to help advocates write with these four questions in mind.

1 There is a reason to organize the brief or motion as it is, or is another way more likely to provide the court with the basis for a sound judicial opinion?

Inherent in that question is that the brief or motion is organized. Many opinions, and not just those involving pro se litigants, bemoan a lack of organization, with some courts even striking filings that fail to follow minimum standards in local rules.7 While a win may be a win, an opinion stating that “the motion is disorganized and requires some explaining”8 may not be something for the mantel piece.

Consider, for example, referencing the acronym IRAC as a guideline for the basic organizational structure. For many motions and briefs, the best organization may be issue; rule; application; conclusion. For other motions or briefs, an alternate organization may be better. Headings and strong paragraphing can showcase the key points. Only deliberate choices lead to a strong organizational structure that supports the presentation of strong arguments.

2 Are all but only the necessary facts included and stated accurately?

Several opinions admonish lawyers for not asking that question. Some go so far as to state, “to exclude immaterial and irrelevant facts, this Court has prepared its own Statement of Facts ... .”9 In another opinion, a lawyer argued that the court was required to read 7,000 pages and could reject the irrelevant information, “begging the question: if certain evidence does not require the Court’s review, why file it?”10

Classify facts into the following categories: (1) outcome-determinative

Write With the Court’s Needs in Mind
facts, (2) relevant but background facts, (3) emotionally relevant facts, (4) unknown facts and (5) extraneous (i.e., irrelevant) facts. Include all outcome-determinative facts. Add in a few of the other types of facts as needed to orient the reader to the outcome-determinative facts and support the argument. Avoid cluttering the brief or motion with unnecessary facts.

3. Is the space given to each issue appropriate given its importance and the complexity of the analysis?
To assist a court in writing an opinion, and to avoid waiver, an argument must be adequately developed: “a cursory mention of an issue in a footnote without citation to legal authority is insufficient ...” A brief or motion, however, need not include all possible arguments or a string cite—or worse, a footnote—to support every sentence.

Reciting basic legal propositions may be a waste of space and a client’s money. For example, a court is presumably familiar with the burdens in summary judgment motions, motions to dismiss for failure to state a claim and other routine motions. While those subjects must be addressed, doing so at length is often unnecessary, unhelpful and even counterproductive. “String cites are to be avoided ... for such noncontroversial items as the standard of review on summary judgment, basic evidentiary principles, and other settled principles and procedures.” Likewise, a string cite to support the proposition that the elements of negligence are duty, breach, cause in fact, proximate cause and damages is unnecessary. One case likely will do the job.

Budget time in your revision process to evaluate what arguments are featured and what level of support is needed to make those arguments in a compelling manner.

4. Does each case support the argument and is needed?
While inundating the court is unhelpful, legal propositions need to be supported with authority. Neglecting to include any citation can create problems, as does including citations without even a parenthetical explanation. One judge recently wrote: “footnotes containing long string cites of cases from outside this circuit—devoid of explanatory parentheticals—do little to aid the Court in resolving the Motion. To the extent possible, in future briefing, the Court directs both parties to cite relevant authority, primarily from this circuit, that supports their arguments ...”

Advocates should assist the court by including pertinent citations. Advocates should also recognize that at times a court may need to consider multiple cases in detail. For example, where a court is evaluating whether an award of punitive damages is excessive, or when a court is called on to award compensatory damages, it may be necessary to discuss many cases because the judge needs to write the opinion to support a particular award. In a recent case involving the amount of general damages to be awarded, a court wrote:

Case law is very helpful in such circumstances, as guidance for the shape of the award in this case. While both Petitioner and Respondent cite to numerous cases in their respective briefs, however, neither party sufficiently analyzed cases that would support their requested figures. Simply adding string cites and listing the amounts awarded for pain and suffering in each case is not particularly helpful. A detailed discussion of the facts of similar cases and the amounts awarded for pain and suffering would better me in reaching a fair and appropriate award.

Join one (or more) today by visiting www.gabar.org > Our Programs > Sections. Questions? Contact Sections Director Mary Jo Sullivan at maryjos@gabar.org.
Finally, and related to this, legal authorities should never be cut-and-pasted from one brief or motion into another. Advocates need to critically evaluate which authorities and how many authorities will add persuasive value to a brief or motion.

While inundating the court is unhelpful, legal propositions need to be supported with authority. Neglecting to include any citation can create problems, as does including citations without even a parenthetical explanation.

Conclusion
A strong legal writer composes documents with purpose that recognizes the needs of the audience. We hope this installment of “Writing Matters” will help you to become a better persuasive writer by considering the needs of the judiciary when composing briefs and motions.

2. Id. More specifically, courts have stated these functions are performed by opinions and the drafting process: First, written opinions communicate a court’s conclusions and the reasons for them to the parties and their lawyers. Second, when published, opinions announce the law to judges, academics, other lawyers, and the interested public. Finally, the preparation of a written opinion imposes intellectual discipline on the author, requiring the judge to clarify his or her reasoning and assess the sufficiency of precedential support for it.

The Plumb Line

The principles embodied in A Lawyer’s Creed and the Aspirational Statement on Professionalism help us remain true to what should be the normal in lawyers’ dealings with their clients, opposing counsel, colleagues, courts, other legal professionals and the public in general.

BY KARLISE Y. GRIER

The plumb bob or plumb line employs the law of gravity to establish what is “plumb” (that is, what is exactly vertical, or true).¹

I once heard a speaker say that society cannot let the crazy, the abnormal and the actions that we believe are wrong become the “normal.” No matter how painful it might sometimes be to face the circumstances of the day, we cannot become numb to what is wrong around us. This is true of what happens in our world. It is also true of what happens in our profession. We have to fight against the sentiment that “it’s just the way things are” when we know something is wrong or abnormal. Becoming desensitized and simply ignoring unacceptable conduct should not be an option.

When you read this article, the first two months of the “new year” will be almost complete. Yet, with most of 2023 in front of us, it will still be the perfect time
One tenet of A Lawyer’s Creed and the Aspirational Statement on Professionalism states: “The dignity and the integrity of our profession is an inheritance that must be maintained by each successive generation of lawyers.”

to dust off your copy of A Lawyer’s Creed and the Aspirational Statement on Professionalism and consider the “plumb line.” One tenet of A Lawyer’s Creed and the Aspirational Statement on Professionalism states: “The dignity and the integrity of our profession is an inheritance that must be maintained by each successive generation of lawyers.” You might ask, “What does this have to do with a plumb line”? A plumb line (or plumb bob) is a tool dating back to ancient Egypt. Evidence suggests that Egyptian architects used plumb bob-like tools to establish verticals in constructing the pyramids between 2600 BCE and 2500 BCE.

A Lawyer’s Creed and the Aspirational Statement on Professionalism also gives us principles to help establish what is true for our profession. The creed embodies principles such as honesty, truthfulness, trustworthiness, integrity, fairness and civility. These principles are our “verticals” to help us remain true to what should be the normal in lawyers’ dealings with their clients, opposing counsel, colleagues, courts, other legal professionals and the public in general.

Notice, the plumb does not change its result based on the circumstances in which it is placed. It remains a true measure of the vertical. Likewise, despite the circumstances in which we are placed as lawyers, our true principles should remain the same. The “result” we should give when someone is rude, dishonest, condescending, untrustworthy, unfair or uncivil is not determined by our circumstances but by our plumb line, the vertical that should show our true character. Does this sound unrealistic and out of touch? If yes, perhaps that is because we have allowed—or are allowing—the abnormal and the crazy to seem normal. For our generation of lawyers to have an inheritance of dignity and integrity to share with future lawyers, we should all have a plumb line that keeps us vertical—which is also defined as upright or upstanding.

It won’t always be easy to remain true to the aspirational goals to which the Supreme Court of Georgia in 1992 asked lawyers to adhere in A Lawyer’s Creed and the Aspirational Statement on Professionalism. We should, nevertheless, not lose sight of these aspirational goals as the normal. This generation of lawyers will, I hope, stand against accepting as normal behavior that is rude, dishonest, condescending, untrustworthy, unfair or uncivil on the occasions when we see it in our profession.

Just as Bob Vila continues to use a plumb line tool similar to the tool the Egyptians used almost 5,000 years ago, let’s continue to use the aspirational goals given to us by the Supreme Court of Georgia a little more than 30 years ago to help keep us vertical so that we may maintain the dignity and the integrity of our profession as an inheritance for the next generation of lawyers.

In Memoriam honors those members of the State Bar of Georgia who have passed away. As we reflect upon the memory of these members, we are mindful of the contributions they made to the Bar. Each generation of lawyers is indebted to the one that precedes it. Each of us is the recipient of the benefits of the learning, dedication, zeal and standard of professional responsibility that those who have gone before us have contributed to the practice of law. We are saddened that they are no longer in our midst, but privileged to have known them and to have shared their friendship over the years.

Martin David "Dave" Merritt Jr., of Atlanta, died in November 2022. Merritt was born July 5, 1933, in Birmingham, Alabama. Later his family moved to Atlanta, where he remained a resident for the rest of his life. Merritt graduated from North Fulton High School in 1951, then studied journalism at the University of Alabama where he played football and was a member of the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity. He enlisted in the U.S. Army in 1955, shortly after graduating college, and served in the infantry while stationed in Korea and Japan; he was honorably discharged in 1957. Upon returning to Atlanta, he worked as a copy editor at the Atlanta Journal Constitution. While there, he enrolled in graduate school at Emory University, switching to the study of law and enrolling at Emory University’s Lamar School of Law, earning his J.D. in 1964. During this time, he met Mary Elizabeth “Liz” O’Hara; they married in 1961, and their marriage was blessed with four children.

In March 1967, Merritt joined Shoob, McLain & Merritt, P.C., after Marvin Shoob joined the federal bench in 1977. Merritt was admitted to the U.S. Supreme Court in 1974, and, over the course of his career, he earned and enjoyed the highest level of respect and admiration from his peers. A renowned litigator, primarily in the area of insurance defense, he tried hundreds of jury cases in the federal and state courts until his retirement in 2015. He attended Peachtree Presbyterian Church for many years. His real passions, however, were enjoying English literature, watching the Atlanta Braves, maintaining the landscape at his home and enthusiastically supporting the Alabama Crimson Tide.

Hon. Clyde L. Reese III died in December 2022.

Reese was born in Florence, South Carolina, and moved to Atlanta with his parents in 1969 at the age of 10. Reese, along with his cousin, Marsha Reese, and her cousin, Alonzo Brown, integrated Pace Academy of Atlanta in 1969. He graduated from Pace in 1976.

Reese graduated from Georgia State University in 1980 with a B.A. in world history and a minor in economics. From 1980-1993, Reese worked in residential real estate in the southwest Atlanta area. His family operated Brown and Reese Realty, one of the first Black-owned residential brokerage firms in Atlanta.

In 1993, Reese entered law school at the Mercer University Walter F. George School of Law in Macon, Georgia. He graduated in 1996 with a J.D. In the summer of 1996, Reese began work as an assistant attorney general in the Georgia Department of Law under Attorney General Michael Bowers. He began in the Regulated Industries Section, which included the Department of Insurance, the Subsequent Injury Trust Fund and the State Health Planning Agency (SHPA). In the fall, the SHPA, which administered the Georgia Certificate of Need law, hired him to be its in-house general counsel. In 1999, SHPA was merged into the newly created Department of Community Health (DCH) along with the Georgia Medicaid program and the State Health Benefit Plan. From 1999 through the summer of 2003, Reese was deputy general counsel of DCH, the largest health care agency in the executive branch.

In 2003, Reese left state government for the private practice of law. From 2003-04, he practiced with Rod Meadows at Meadows & Lewis in Stockbridge, Georgia. From 2004-07 he was owner and principal of Reese & Hopkins, LLC, a firm specializing in state and federal health care regulatory matters. The firm represented hosp-tals, ambulatory surgery centers, physicians and physician group practices, imaging providers and other health care entities.

In the fall of 2007, Reese returned to state government with DCH to oversee the Certificate of Need program and as general counsel. In May 2010, Gov. Sonny Perdue appointed Reese as commissioner of DCH. In January 2011, Gov. Nathan Deal appointed him as commissioner of the Department of Human Services (DHS). DHS oversees the state’s child welfare system, human services benefits, child support and aging programs. In July 2013, Reese returned to DCH as commissioner for a second time and served in that capacity until his appointment to the Court of Appeals of Georgia on Nov. 1, 2016, by Gov. Nathan Deal. At the time of his departure from DCH, it had a combined state and federal budget of more than $14 billion with more than 1,000 employees. Reese spent considerable time traveling the state visiting hospitals and other health care providers. He took a particular interest in the challenge of access to health care in rural areas of Georgia.

Reese was a member of the Chief Justice’s Commission on Professionalism of the Supreme Court of Georgia. He was a member of the Mercer Law School Board of Visitors. Reese established the Judge Clyde Reese Book Award at Mercer University Walter F. George School of Law. The award, in honor of his parents, Clyde and Dorothy Reese, grants $1,000 to a deserving minority student selected by the school to help defray the cost of law books. He also served as co-chair of the State Bar of Georgia SOLACE Committee. In May 2018, Reese won election to a new six-year term on the Court of Appeals, which began on Jan. 1, 2019.

Reese was a proud father of five children. He also had three grandchildren. Reese was a resident of Douglas County and a member of the Friendship Community Church for more than 36 years.

Fletcher Thompson, former U.S. congressman and Georgia state senator, died in September 2022. Thompson was born in College Park, Georgia, on Feb. 5, 1925. He attended Central Park Elementary and Russell High School in East Point graduating in June 1942.

In February 1943, he enlisted in the U.S. Army Air Corps serving as a second lieutenant and navigator in the Pacific until 1946. He entered Emory University, graduating in 1949. Thompson was called back into the U.S. Air Force and served as pilot in a B-47 until the end of 1953. Among other things, his duties included flying through hydrogen bomb test clouds at Enewetok Atoll to collect samples and determine the level of radioactivity.

Returning to East Point, Thompson began a career in aviation insurance while attending Woodrow Wilson College of Law. After graduation in 1957, he passed the Georgia bar exam in 1958. Thompson commenced the practice of law in East Point in 1963. He was elected to the Georgia Senate in 1964. In 1966, Thompson was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives where he served three terms. He was president of the freshman Republican Congress (90th) and also was president of an aviation insurance firm before and after his public service, later selling his interest.

Thompson practiced law full time until the late ‘70s when he acquired and ran a freight forwarding company in addition to his law practice. He was a member of the Atlanta Regional Commission in the mid-‘80s.

From 2009-11, Thompson served as the commander of the Atlanta World War II Roundtable, an organization that was created in 1986 "to hear and record the war experiences of World War II, and to pass on to posterity the knowledge of World War II and the price—human and material—that was paid by our nation for the preservation of freedom in the United States and the world." He remained a faithful and loyal member of the group until his death.
